FORTIETH CONGRESS. FIRST SESSION.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 4, 1867.

In accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress," approved January 22, 1867, the Fortieth Congress commenced its first session this day, the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress having closed at noon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate [Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE, of Ohio] called the Senate to order.

The Chaplain of the Senate for the Thirty-Ninth Congress, Rev. EDGAR H. GRAY, D.D., of Washington, opened the proceedings with the following

PRAYER.

O God, from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God. Men die, but Thou livest evermore. Governments change, but Thy dominion is an everlasting dominion. Senates and Legislatures and councils cease, but the Triune Council of the great God continues and holds on through all the cycles of eternity. We thank Thee that Thou hast given us such a great country in trust; that it has become the asylum for the oppressed and the home of the free. We thank Thee for a Government so free that every citizen may participate in its privileges and blessings; so just that the rights of every individual shall be respected; so stable that though Cabinets and councils and Senates cease, yet it holds on in its grand principles and cardinal doctrines. We thank Thee for Thy goodness and mercy which have been extended toward the members of this body and of both Houses of Congress during the last session. O God, we bless Thee that the lives and health of so many of Thy Senators have been continued unto them, and that the Thirty-Ninth Congress has closed up so favorably, and the Fortieth is inaugurated so auspiciously.

Now, we invoke the Divine blessing to be upon this body, upon Thy servant who has just been selected to preside over all of its deliberations. Give him strength; give him wisdom; give him grace; and grant that the good hand of Thy providence may be upon every Senator, upon those who have long been serving their country, and upon those who are just to assume the duties and the responsibilities of Senators. God, grant to be with them and protect every member of this body in his life and strength during the sessions of this Congress: and let Thy blessing be upon both Houses, and grant to preside over the deliberations of both and guide them to wise measures and wise enactments. Let Thy blessing rest upon the President and upon the members of the Cabinet, and let Thy blessing be upon the judges in our courts and upon the Army and the Navy, the defenders of our country, and upon the people. May we be a people whose God is the Lord. Have all the interests and institutions of this country in Thy safe care and keeping; and grant to hedge about us as a people, to defend us from the pestilence that walketh in darkness and from the destruction that wasteth at noonday. Guide us in all our affairs and in all our efforts to uplift degraded humanity; and may we go forth leading the van of the nations in the great work of human progress and evangelization. God grant that His blessing may be upon us and make us faithful in the discharge of all our high trusts and duties; and when we are called from this to another world may we hear the great Judge saying to each of us individually, "Well done, good and faithful servant: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Through Jesus Christ we ask it. Amen.

NEW SENATORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first business in order is the qualification of the newly-elected Senators; and they will come forward and be qualified as their names are read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the list, as follows:

As their names were called the Senators came forward, and the oaths, prescribed by law were administered to them, and they took their seats in the Senate.

SENATORS FROM NEBRASKA.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If all the Senators whose names are upon the roll have been qualified—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have been.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have the pleasure of presenting to the Senate the credentials of Hon. JOHN M. THAYER, and Hon. T. W. TIPTON, elected Senators from the new State of Nebraska. I ask that their credentials be read and that the gentlemen be sworn.

The credentials were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senators from Nebraska will now come forward and be qualified.

The Senators-elect were conducted to the desk of the President pro tempore by Mr. SUMNER and Mr. CHANDLER, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. THAYER and Mr. TIPTON, they took their seats in the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators from the State of Nebraska shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the Senate of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the Constitution requires, and that the Secretary put into the ballot-box three papers of equal size, numbered 1, 2, 3. Each of the Senators from the State of Nebraska shall draw out one paper. The paper numbered 1, if drawn, shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1869; the paper numbered 2, if drawn, shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1871; and the paper numbered 3, if drawn, shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service expire the 3d day of March, 1873.

The resolution was adopted.

Three papers were accordingly put into the ballot-box; the Senators from Nebraska advanced to the Secretary's desk, and each drew one paper. Mr. THAYER drew the paper numbered two, and was placed in the class of Senators whose terms will expire March 3, 1871. Mr. TIPTON drew the paper numbered one, and was placed in the class of Senators whose terms will expire March 3, 1869.

The following members failed to answer to their names: ELIUB B. WASHBURN, of Illinois; ROSCOE CONKLING, of New York; SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, and RUFUS MALLORY, of Oregon.

The CLERK. A quorum having appeared, it is competent for this body to proceed to elect a Speaker.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now move that this House proceed to the election of a Speaker for the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Clerk, I observe in calling the roll—this list which I have before me, and I presume printed by order of the Clerk—there are sixteen absent States, six of which have been called by the Clerk, but have no representation upon the floor of this House, and ten of which, although upon the list, have not been called by the Clerk.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order, that no debate is in order until after the House proceeds to the election of its officers.

The CLERK. The Clerk overrules the point of order, the previous question not having been called.

Mr. BROOKS. The same question was made at the organization of the previous House, and the same decision was then made by the Clerk.

Mr. Clerk, there are sixteen States absent, and twenty States are about to proceed to the organization of this House in the midst of a crisis, ay, in the midst of a revolution—civil I hope it is to be—the very gravest it has ever been the fortune, or the misfortune of our country rather, to pass through. Of the original States, there are now absent, of the thirteen original States which framed the Constitution of the United States, the work of our fathers—seven of these original thirteen have no Representatives upon the floor of this House.

My attention has been called to the fact there are precedents which authorize not alone this extra, but this very extraordinary convocation of the Congress of the United States; but there are no precedents in our political history which justify the assembling and organization of this House while so large a number of States are absent, and with so short a notice given to the absent States with the power and right to be represented here.

I have here before me a list of the cases showing when each Congress has assembled. It is as follows: on first Monday in January, 1790; on fourth Monday in October, 1791; on first Monday in November, 1792; on first Monday in November, 1794; on first Monday in November, 1797; changed to second Monday in November, 1797; on third Monday in November, 1800; on first Monday in November, 1803; on first Monday in November, 1804; on first Monday in November, 1808; on fourth Monday in May, 1809; on fourth Monday in November, 1809; on first Monday in November, 1812; on fourth Monday in May, 1813; on first Monday in December, 1813; on last Monday in October, 1814; on third Monday in November, 1818; on second Monday in November, 1820.

It will be found on examination even in the trying crisis of the war of 1812, when the whole world seemed to be let loose on our country, that our fathers of that day did not venture to convocate the Congress of the United States without giving all of the States full time and full power to be represented. The shortest period of notice which was ever given was during the war of 1812 under the act of February 27, 1813, when three months notice was given for the assembling of Congress, not as now a brief notice of one month and nine days. When the notice was thus given to the people and the States of the United States, the boundaries of our States extended only from the Chattahoochee, in Georgia, to the Passamaquoddy, in Maine. The boundaries of the Republic have since been greatly extended until our vast domain reaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a breadth of territory, a vastness of population, which it is impossible for the notice which has been given for the convocation of this Congress to have reached in one month and nine days.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask him whether at that time the present railroad and telegraph system of the country was in operation? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. There are some people who ask foolish questions. [Laughter.] Parliamentary propriety forbids me to say to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania that so well informed a gentleman as he should never ask so foolish a question as that, about a fact that is notorious to the whole public. [Laughter.] Sir, there are large extents of Territory in Oregon, in California, infinitely further removed from the legal action of their own States, from the processes of law which are necessary for the convocation of Congress; there are Territories not reached by telegraph, not reached by railroads, which have rendered it practically impossible for a State like California to be represented upon the floor of this House.

Except in the dark and doubtful period of the war, when it was necessary for an early assemblage here, from three to eight months notice has been given of the convocation of Congress by legislative enactment. The act of 1789 gave three months' notice; the act of 1791 seven months; the act of 1792 six months; the act of 1794 five months; the act of 1797 eight months; the act of 1800 five and a half months; the act of 1803 eight months; the act of 1804 seven months; the act of 1808 six months; the act of January 7, 1809, four months; the act of June, 1809, five months; the act of 1812 four months; the act of February, 1813, three months; the act of July, 1813, four months; the act of 1818 six months; the act of 1820 five months. And now, in the midst of the greatest crisis through which our country has ever passed, only one month and nine days' notice has been given for the thirty million people of the United States to be represented on the floor of this House. Hence these vacancies in the northern States; hence old States like Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, three of the original thirteen, are about to be disfranchised by you if you act here with those States unrepresented upon this floor.

You have the power, but I deny the right. It is a violent and extraordinary exercise of power, not to be justified for one Congress immediately thus to convoke another.

There are those out of these Halls who have called the Congress which has just expired the rump Congress. I indulge in no such phraseology upon this floor. I respect my associates who are about me, and therefore I indulge in no such allusions to the history of Cromwell and of the Independents and Presbyterians of old. But while I indulge in no such allusion, I caution the House not to deserve of this country, by assuming to legislate for it now, not only the name of rump Congress, but of rump of a rump Congress.

Sir, there are those who believe this is not as thus assembled a legal, constitutional Congress. I am not lawyer enough to pronounce an opinion upon that point. I do not believe it to be a de jure Congress, nor that this is a de jure Government created by this Congress; but I recognize it as a de facto Congress, if not de jure, and therefore I obey its authority as I would the authority of a de facto Government if I were under the dominion of the Turk, the Tartar, the Camanche, the Ojibway, or the Potawatomie. [Laughter.] I respect authority wherever it may be presented. I bow to the omnipotence of force, and entertaining these views, which are concurred in by those who act with me on party questions, we bow, but while we bow we have prepared a solemn protest against any further revolutionary action upon the part of this House until a full Congress is assembled.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman from New York to state whether it is not the fact that the most important Congress that ever assembled in this nation, both in its action and its results, was convened by proclamation upon sixty days' notice, and that, too, in the absence of some of the States of this Union?

Mr. BROOKS. As to the right and power of the President by proclamation to convoke Congress, no one disputes that, but there are those who dispute—I do not—the right of one Congress thus to assemble another without the intervention of a proclamation from the President; but I do say that in all our history no act like this, so utterly unprecedented has been done; a spectacle like that exhibited here this hour has never before been seen in this country, the spectacle of a Speaker retiring from his seat, and amid the confusion of his exit another Congress in which sixteen States are unrepresented appearing on the floor of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I would ask the gentleman from New York if he has any recollection that President Pierce called together an extra session of Congress by proclamation on three days' notice?

Mr. BROOKS. I repeat what I said before, that the right and power of the President by proclamation to call Congress together is indisputable; but it was then in the power of the States, by previous notice on the part of the President, to be prepared, and although I have not looked into the facts, yet I am not certain that every State could not then have had Representatives upon the floor of this House. Nearly all the members of Congress were here. I am told by one of my associates that it was only the reassembling of a Congress that had been previously organized, so that whatever argument can be drawn from that interrogatory is altogether without application to this case.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly I will if the gentleman insists, but I wish I could be permitted to proceed with my remarks. I do not wish to be discourteous on so solemn an occasion as this.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would suggest, by way of interrogatory, that inasmuch as the law has ordained the assembling of Congress on this day, if there is anything wrong in it would it not be better to organize for the purpose of applying the remedy? For if it be wrong for Congress to meet here, six States being without representation, then this body, without organization, can do nothing to remedy that state of things; and could not this body, if organized, remedy it by changing the law, if necessary? It seems to me that finding fault with the law can in no way remedy the evil of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. BROOKS. I will reply to the gentleman from Illinois, but I hope that gentleman will allow me to proceed without further interruption.

In the first place, the gentleman is in error in saying that there are but six States unrepresented on this floor. There are sixteen States unrepresented on this floor.

Mr. WOOD. There are seventeen. Nebraska is unrepresented.

Mr. BROOKS. Is there no Representative of Nebraska here?

The CLERK. No representative from the State of Nebraska has responded.

Mr. BROOKS. Then there are seventeen States—one more than I named—absent from the floor of the House, and there are here the Representatives from twenty States attempting to do the business of this Congress in the absence of seventeen States.

And now a word as to the suggestion made by my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. BROMWELL.] that we should proceed to organize and then correct whatever error there may be in the law hereafter. Why, Mr. Clerk, the organization of this House is the possession and control of and government of this House and of the whole country. Upon the organization of this House depends the selection of the committees and the direction of public affairs; in fact the whole government of the House is the organization of the House, to which we are called upon to proceed so suddenly; and if the hints and indications which I hear or see in the public press are to be realized, or, to speak plainly, if the process of impeachment of the President is to go on, or, what is more revolutionary, a suspension of the President of the United States by the action of this House, that revolution—for it is a revolution, call it what name you please—will be carried on by a committee of this House, who will have the whole direction and conduct of that process of impeachment through this House.

I say, therefore, that the most serious of all the steps we can take is the organization of the House; and sir, in certain contingencies, in case the President should be deposed, or in case of his death, the Speaker of this House might become President of the United States; so that in point of fact here, by our solemn action to-day, we may be creating a President of the United States. I protest, therefore, under the full solemnities of the occasion, I protest before this Congress and before my country, and in the presence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] who is to be the leader in this revolution, I protest most solemnly against taking one further step until all the States are fully represented upon the floor of this House.

And now, Mr. Clerk, I will proceed to read the protest, which, in due time, I shall ask to have entered upon the Journal of the House, against any further action of this House of Representatives until an organization can be properly and legally effected:

Whereas it appears by the record just read that the following States, seventeen in number, are not now represented upon the floor of this House: the States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Tennessee, Kentucky, California, Arkansas, and Nebraska—States entitled by the act of Congress of March 4, 1837, and subsequent acts, to a representation in Congress as follows, namely: New Hampshire, three Representatives; Rhode Island, two Representatives; Connecticut, four Representatives; Virginia, eight Representatives; North Carolina, seven Representatives; South Carolina, four Representatives; Georgia, seven Representatives; Florida, one Representative; Alabama, six Representatives; Mississippi, five Representatives; Louisiana, five Representatives; Texas, four Representatives; Tennessee, eight Representatives; Kentucky, nine Representatives; California, three Representatives; Arkansas, three Representatives; and Nebraska, one Representative; in all, eighty congressional districts now unrepresented on the floor of this House; and whereas of these unrepresented States, seven are of the original thirteen that in 1787 met in Convention and created the Constitution of the United States, namely: New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, a majority of the original thirteen: Therefore,

We, members-elect of the Fortieth Congress, do now enter our most solemn protest against any and every action tending to the organization of this House until the absent States be more fully represented:

JAMES BROOKS, New York;
A. J. GLOSSBRENNER, Pennsylvania;
WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, Indiana;
W. E. NIBLACK, Indiana;
J. M. HUMPHREY, New York;
JOHN A. NICHOLSON, Delaware;
CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE, Wisconsin;
M. C. KERR, Indiana;
T. VAN TROMP, Ohio;
STEPHEN TABER, New York;
D. M. VAN AUKEN, Pennsylvania;
B. M. BOYER, Pennsylvania;
LEWIS W. ROSS, Illinois;
S. S. MARSHALL, Illinois;
CHARLES DENISON, Pennsylvania;
FERNANDO WOOD, New York;
STEVENSON ARCHER, Maryland;
J. LAWRENCE GETZ, Pennsylvania;
T. E. NOELL, Missouri;
W. MUNGEN, Ohio;
W. E. ROBINSON, New York;
DEMAS BARNES, New York;
JOHN FOX, New York;
ALBERT G. BURR, Illinois;
JOHN MORRISSEY, New York;
F. STONE, Maryland;
GEORGE W. MORGAN, Ohio;
CHARLES SITGREAVES, New Jersey;
CHARLES HAIGHT, New Jersey;
JOHN W. CHANLER, New York;
JOHN V. L. PRUYN, New York.

I now ask that this be entered upon the Journal as the protest of the minority of this House.

The CLERK. The Clerk declines to entertain any paper of the character of that indicated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] or any other matter pending the action of the House. The Clerk is now acting under the law; his duties are clearly prescribed; and it is impossible for him to entertain any motion or any business not consistent with the organization of this House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not propose to submit any extended remarks in reply to what has just been said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] This body is assembled in pursuance of law. That such is the case is recognized by the gentleman from New York and his associates from his and their presence here. He seems to have forgotten that for more than four years ten of the States enumerated by him, in the paper which he has just read, waged a fearful war against this Government. But that fact has not been forgotten by the people, nor is it forgotten by the Representatives of the people here assembled. I will not attempt to review the precedents he has cited in connection with former extra sessions of Congress. This is not an extra session; it is the first regular session of the Fortieth Congress, convened in pursuance of law. I now call the previous question on the resolution I have submitted.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, to proceed to the election of Speaker; and it was agreed to.

The CLERK. Nominations are now in order for the office of Speaker.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now desire to place in nomination for the office of Speaker of this House of Representatives the name of SCHUYLER COLFAX, of Indiana. [Great applause on the floor and in the galleries.] In doing so, Mr. Clerk, I may say that I believe this nomination is concurred in by every member of the political organization with which I act. It is so heartily concurred in and believed to be a fit and proper nomination by that organization that it has not been necessary for the party to hold any caucus whatever on the subject. I submit the name I have mentioned as a candidate for Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. NICHOLSON. As it is the determination of this House to proceed to the election of Speaker at this time, I place in nomination the name of SAMUEL S. MARSHALL, of Illinois. [Applause from Democratic members.]

The CLERK appointed to act as tellers, Messrs. BANKS, of Massachusetts, ELDRIDGE, of Wisconsin, PAINE, of Wisconsin, and BOYER, of Pennsylvania.

The House proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker, with the following result, which was announced by Mr. BANKS on behalf of the tellers:

Whole number of votes cast 157; necessary to a choice 79; of which—

Mr. Colfax received.....127
Mr. Marshall.....30

The following is the vote in detail:

For Mr. Colfax—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullum, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchon, Koontz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Meure, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Polsey, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Raun, Robertson, Robinson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Stewart, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge.

For Mr. Marshall—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Denison, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Kerr, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Pruyn, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Wood.

The CLERK announced that SCHUYLER COLFAX, one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana, having received a majority of all the votes given, was duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Fortieth Congress. [Applause.]

At the suggestion of the Clerk, Mr. MARSHALL and Mr. POMEROY conducted Mr. COLFAX to the Chair, when he addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: Elected for the third time to this responsible and trying position, I appreciate more than ever before the importance of this trust, and realize more than when first entering on its difficult duties the absolute necessity of your confidence and support. Nor do I overrate the gravity of our position as American legislators.

"The years have never dropped their sand
On mortal issue vast and grand
As our's to-day."

A nation decimated by the conflicts of fraternal strife, a land desolated by the destructive marches of hostile armies, a people with the fruits of prolonged war ripened with the gloomy harvest of hearts dead with the bullet, as well as hearts heavy with bereavements and broken with anguish, look anxiously, from North and South alike, to this Capitol of our continental domain.

But there is a pathway of duty, luminous with light, and by that light should we walk. It is to guide our steps by the justice of God and the rights of man. It is to anchor our legislation on what the great commoner of England, John Bright, declares to be the simple but sublime principles on which great national questions should be settled, the basis of eternal right. It is to write on our banner those words that will shine brighter than the stars that gem the firmament—liberty, loyalty, and law. It is to so make history that posterity shall rise up and call us blessed.

The Congress which has just passed away has written a record that will be long remembered by the poor and the friendless, whom it did not forget. Misrepresented or misunderstood by those who denounced it as enemies, harshly and unjustly criticised by some who should have been its friends, it proved itself more faithful to human progress and liberty than any of its predecessors. The outraged and the oppressed found in these congressional Halls champions and friends. Its key-note of policy was protection to the downtrodden. It quailed not before the mightiest and neglected not the obscurest. It lifted the slave whom the nation had freed up to the full stature of manhood. It placed on our statute-book the civil rights bill as our national Magna Charta, grander than all the enactments that honor the American code. And in all the region whose civil governments had been destroyed by a vanquished rebellion it declared as a guarantee of defense to the weakest that the freeman's hand should wield the freeman's ballot, and that none but loyal men should govern a land which loyal sacrifices had saved. Taught, too, by inspiration that new wine could not be safely put in old bottles, it proclaimed that there could be no safe or loyal reconstruction on a foundation of unrepentant treason or disloyalty.

Fortunate will it be for us if, when we surrender these seats to our successors, we can point to a record which will shine on our historic page like that of the Congress which has just expired. Thrice fortunate if, when we leave this Capitol, our whole national structure shall be permanently restored, resting on the same foundation-stones of loyalty, unity, liberty, and right.

With such convictions of duty, I come to this chair to administer your rules, but not as a partisan. I appeal to you for that generous support by which alone a Presiding Officer can be sustained, pledging you in return an inflexible impartiality which shall be proved by my deeds. And, invoking on your deliberations the favor of Him who holds the destinies of nations in the hollow of His hand, I am now ready to take the oath of office prescribed by law.

Mr. DAWES, having served longest continuously as a member of the House, was designated by the Clerk to administer to the Speaker-elect the oath prescribed by law; which was done in the following form:

"I, SCHUYLER COLFAX, do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto.

"And I do further swear that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

The SPEAKER then administered to the members present the oath prescribed by law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The following message from the Senate was delivered by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 4, 1867.

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of two members, be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Ordered, That Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. BUCKALEW be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

NOTIFICATION OF ORGANIZATION.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may make.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. DAWES, Mr. MARSHALL, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, as the committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As I have an engagement this afternoon in regard to the case of a gentleman claiming a seat here as a Delegate, I beg to decline the appointment just announced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be excused, and in his stead the Chair appoints the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer not to serve on that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make another appointment.

Subsequently the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. POMEROY.

Mr. STEVENS submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate informing that body that a quorum of the House has assembled and elected SCHUYLER COLFAX, one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana, Speaker, and is now ready to proceed to business.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BANKS submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Ninth Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered.

Resolved further, That a committee of five, to consist of the Speaker and four members to be named by him, be appointed, to whom shall be referred the rules of the House, who shall be authorized to report at any time such amendments on the revision of the same as they may think proper.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me one word?

Mr. BANKS. I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. BROOKS. Probably this is the only opportunity that I shall have to make a suggestion to those who may frame the rules, and I desire to avail myself of it.

We on this side of the House feel it to be of the highest importance to us and to the cause of free discussion and of human liberty that the rules of the House should be somewhat more liberalized, to allow the minority more freedom of expression. We do not feel that we have had freedom of expression heretofore in the discussion of the various questions arising here; and what is precedent to-day may become law to-morrow. I take the liberty, therefore, of suggesting to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and through him to the House, the propriety of so framing the rules as to allow the minority, as far as may be consistent with the transaction of the public business, opportunities to express their opinions upon the great subjects of the day; for it must be obvious to the gentleman as a reader of history that there is less freedom of discussion now in this House of Representatives than there is in the Legislative Assembly of France, in the British House of Commons, or in the Assembly of Switzerland—less than in any other country having a constitutional Government—less than is allowed under the monarchical Governments of Europe.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from New York if he refers to the action of the House this morning as the precedent in which three fourths of the time occupied in discussion in the Fortieth Congress have been used by gentlemen on the other side, and particularly by the gentleman himself? [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. The object of the resolution which I move is to effect a temporary organization. The gentleman from New York or any of the members of the House will have ample opportunity hereafter to present such changes as they may desire for the consideration of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman will permit me to interrupt him with a single remark. We are now bound by the old rules until the new ones are adopted, and I believe it has hitherto been the practice to defer their adoption until a later period of the session. It is important that the rules should be adopted at this time, and I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say one word, with the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts. In regard to calling the yeas and nays there is no doubt. It is all fixed by the Constitution, and therefore unless the Constitution is amended it must remain as it is.

Mr. BANKS. I now insist on my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, The rules be so amended that it will be in order during the remainder of this week to suspend the rules by a vote of two thirds.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 31, not voting 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Rander W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Daves, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Latfin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Polsley, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Selye, Shaanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Stewart, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernum, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William B. Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Burr, Chanter, Denison, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Kerr, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Pruyn, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, and Wood—31.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Buckland, Colfax, Hasley, Hulbert, Phelps, Poland, Robinson, Van Trump, and Elihu B. Washburne—9.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF CLERK.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That Edward McPherson, of Pennsylvania, be, and is hereby, elected Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object. I believe it is the understanding that there is to be this evening a caucus of the Republican members of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say that we had understood that no other officer than Speaker would be elected until after the caucus this evening, but upon turning to the law I find that it is imperative that no business can be done until both a Speaker and Clerk have been elected. Therefore it is deemed necessary to elect a Clerk before we adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I merely wished to call attention to the fact that such was the general understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ascertained that there are precedents on this subject. In the Thirty-First Congress, when the Clerk died, the Speaker said that no business could be transacted until another Clerk was elected, because there was no officer to carry messages to the Senate. Is there objection to electing a Clerk by resolution?

No objection was made, and the resolution was accordingly agreed to.

Hon. EDWARD MCPHERSON, the Clerk-elect, then appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

CONTENDED ELECTION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to present the memorial of Columbus Delano, of Ohio, who contests the seat in this House of George W. Morgan, returned as Representative from the thirteenth district of that State. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections when that committee shall be appointed.

The memorial was ordered to be so referred.

TARIFF ON WOOL—ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that during the last moments of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, before twelve o'clock to-day, the President of the United States signed in the room occupied by him in the Capitol, the bill in regard to the tariff on wool and woollens; and as it was not deemed proper to interrupt the Presiding Officer in the delivery of his valedictory remarks, it was handed to the Clerk who entered it upon the Journal. And the same was done with reference to the Army appropriation bill, which the President's Private Secretary has handed to the Speaker, accompanied by a message giving his reasons, under protest, why he signed that bill. If there is no objection, the message will be read.

No objection being made, the Clerk read the following

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

To the House of Representatives:

The act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," contains provisions to which I must call attention. Those provisions are contained in the second section, which in certain cases virtually deprives the President of his constitutional functions as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in the sixth section which denies to ten States of this Union their constitutional right to protect themselves in any emergency by means of their own militia. Those provisions are out of place in an appropriation act. I am compelled to defeat these necessary appropriations if I withhold my signature to the act. Pressed by these considerations I feel constrained to return the bill with my signature, but to accompany it with my protest against the sections which I have indicated.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

March 2, 1867.

The message was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL DELEGATES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by the law, the Clerk of the House cannot put on the roll as formerly the names of the Delegates from the various Territories. He can only place there the names of the Representatives of the States. The Chair holds in his hand the credentials of Delegates, and asks the House to take such action on the subject as it may see fit.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will send to the Clerk's desk a resolution providing for placing on the roll the names of the Delegates.

The SPEAKER. The House is aware there is a contested election for Colorado.

The Clerk read the resolution offered by Mr. FARNSWORTH, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House place upon the roll the names of Delegates from the several Territories whose credentials show prima facie that they were duly elected as such Delegates.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire the gentleman from Illinois to amend the resolution so as to provide that the contested case of the Delegate from Colorado be sent to the Committee of Elections for that committee to determine upon the question, and report to the House which claimant is entitled to a seat.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This resolution only provides for admitting such Delegates as show prima facie that they were duly elected. I recollect some instances in which there were contested-election cases from the Territories. There was a case from Dakota a few years ago, I recollect, in which the House ordered the name of Mr. Jaynes to be placed on the roll. The case was afterward examined by the Committee of Elections and on their report the House unseated Mr. Jaynes, and seated the other claimant, General Todd. I suppose that the same rule should apply to Delegates that applies to members, and that whoever has the certificate showing prima facie that he was elected should be admitted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman the propriety of having these cases presented individually in order that they may be disposed of upon the merits of each case. There is, I believe, but one case where difficulty occurs in regard to the right to the seat, and that is the case of Colorado. I suggest that the usual course be pursued, and that the credentials of the Delegates be presented in their order so that we may have the sense of the House taken in the Colorado case on a motion to refer it to the Committee of Elections when appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we had better postpone this matter and adjourn.

CONTENDED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from James H. Birch, contesting the seat of Hon. Robert T. Van Horn, from the sixth congressional district of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of Elections when appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at two o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 5, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D.D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THANKS TO GEORGE PEABODY.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, of which no previous notice has been given.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody; which was read twice. It proposes to present the thanks of Congress to George Peabody, of Massachusetts, for his great and peculiar beneficence in giving a large sum of money, amounting to $2,000,000, for the promotion of education in the more destitute portions of the southern and southwestern States, the benefits of which, according to his directions, are to be distributed among the entire population, without any distinction, except as to means or opportunities for usefulness; and it also directs the presentation to Mr. Peabody of a gold medal, with suitable devices and inscriptions, in the name of the people of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has not yet received any notification from the House of Representatives that that House is organized; and the Chair thinks that legislative business cannot be proceeded with until Congress is organized.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, then, I will let it lie on the table for a few moments.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to give notice that I shall to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to guaranty a republican form of government in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, and to provide for the restoration of these States to practical relations with the Union.

I also give further notice that I shall ask leave to introduce a bill to prescribe an oath to maintain a republican form of government in the rebel States.

Mr. WILSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution to facilitate the settlement of claims for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished by loyal persons to the Army of the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were read twice by their titles, and ordered to lie on the table:

A bill (S. No. 1) to reorganize the judiciary of the United States.

A bill (S. No. 2) to regulate certain proceedings in criminal cases.

A bill (S. No. 3) concerning injunctions and proceedings in civil cases.

Mr. STEWART. I move that these bills be printed. I do not expect immediate action on them; but I wish to have them circulated among the judges and to get their opinions in regard to them before Congress shall meet next winter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Shunk; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 5) to extend the time for taking effect of the act relating to wool and wools; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 6) changing the route of a certain land-grant railroad in Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, supplementary to other joint resolutions to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867; and in introducing it I will make a brief statement. The resolution in the form I now present it is the one that was adopted by both Houses, but failed to be presented in season for the signature of the President. I present it now with the amendments ingrafted upon it in the House of Representatives. I hope there can be no question with regard to it, but that the Senate will act upon it to-day. I will not press it at this moment; I will wait till we hear from the other House.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the bankrupt law be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

At twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, Mr. EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled and elected SCHUYLER COLFAX, one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana, Speaker; and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

I am also directed to inform the Senate that the House has concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a committee of the two Houses to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses have assembled and are ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and has appointed Mr. HENRY L. DAWES of Massachusetts, Mr. S. S. MARSHALL of Illinois, and Mr. T. M. POMEROY of New York, the committee on the part of the House.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That William Pierce have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FREYLINGHUYSEN presented papers in support of the claims of Francis A. Powe and Eliza G. Kearney to pensions; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Rebecca C. Meeker, praying for a pension; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of George M. Willing, of Arizona, praying that steps be taken to acquire the territory at the mouth of the Colorado river; which was ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the joint committee of the two Houses appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him of their organization and readiness to receive any communication he might be pleased to make, have performed that duty and were informed by the President that he had no communication to make to Congress at this time.

THANKS TO GEORGE PEABODY.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution offered by me a while ago.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust we are not going to begin the business of the Senate at this early day by the passage of measures of this kind without the proper reference to a committee. It is a departure from all the established customs of the Senate; and I think it would be well enough for us to know something about the conditions upon which the supposed benefaction has been conferred. I confess I am ignorant of them except such information as I have had opportunity to derive from telegraphic dispatches in the newspapers.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is mistaken when he refers to telegraphic dispatches in the newspapers. This act was set forth at length in the documents by which it is recorded, published in all our newspapers here in Washington, where I believe the documents were dated. The information in regard to it is ample. It is one of those rare public acts which, it seems to me, Congress will honor itself by honoring. I do not wish to press this proposition if Senators are indisposed to consider it now. On other occasions they have considered propositions of thanks for eminent services, and I know no occasion when they might more properly proceed to the consideration of such a question without a reference to a committee than this.

Mr. GRIMES. All I have to say is that there is no evidence at all before the Senate or before Congress upon this subject. According to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, his information is solely derived from the newspapers published in the city of Washington.

Mr. SUMNER. And every other newspaper published in the country.

Mr. GRIMES. Whether their information is accurate or not we know not. I am not aware that the Senate has ever before attempted to pass a vote of thanks without a reference to a committee, without proper consideration, without knowing specifically what that vote of thanks is based upon. I am not going to interpose an objection so as to throw the resolution over on my single objection. If it be the disposition of the Senate to inaugurate business in this way, I shall acquiesce in it.

Mr. SUMNER. I yield, then, to the Senator from Iowa, and will let the joint resolution lie on the table for the present. I regret, however, that the Senate does not at once and in the promptest way possible express its recognition of this great and magnanimous benefaction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution is withdrawn.

PARIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution relating to the Paris Exhibition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Senate is hardly in a condition to proceed with any of its legislative business; the committees are not yet formed; and after the preliminary business of the morning is gone through with I think we had better adjourn and not undertake to do legislative business to-day. The Senator from Massachusetts seems to act on the assumption that because a bill passed at the last Congress therefore it need not be referred now, and every one knows all about it; but he must remember that one third of this body is new, and the entire House of Representatives is new, and it strikes me that in regard to any legislative business we had better pursue the ordinary course; and if there be no other preliminary business of the morning I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 5, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock in.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMBERS SWORN IN.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, a Representative-elect from the State of Pennsylvania, appeared and having taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the law of July 2, 1862, took his seat.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DAWES. The committee of the House appointed to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inquire whether he had any communication to make to this Congress, have discharged that duty, and report that they have waited upon the President, and have been informed by him that he has no communication to make to Congress at this time.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. DAWES. I have been requested to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That N. G. Ordway be, and is hereby, declared duly elected Sergeant-at-Arms; that Charles E. Lippincott, be, and hereby is, declared duly elected Doorkeeper; and that William S. King be, and hereby is, duly elected Postmaster, of the House of Representatives for the Fortieth Congress.

The SPEAKER. By the rules of the House these elections must be viva voce. Is there any objection to the suspension of the rules?

Mr. BROOKS. What would be the use of objection?

The SPEAKER. If any member objects, the rules will have to be suspended by a two-thirds vote. Is there any objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

The Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster-elect presented themselves, and were qualified by taking the usual oath of office.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. PRICE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That we now proceed to select seats for members of the Fortieth Congress in the same manner as seats were allotted for the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman withdraw that demand for a moment?

Mr. PRICE. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I do not propose to oppose the resolution, but I wish the gentleman to modify it after a statement which I will make. Mr. ELIHU B. WASHBURN, the oldest member of the House in time of service has been compelled by ill-health to leave the country for Europe and to be absent from his seat here. This ill-health was incurred in the service of the House upon one of its committees, and I ask the gentleman from Iowa to either modify his resolution, or else I ask unanimous consent that Mr. WASHBURN's seat, which he has occupied for the last four years, may be left for him, and I will also suggest that the same courtesy be granted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. PRICE. I will accept both amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that by unanimous consent Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, whose health has been impaired by service on a committee of the House, and who is now in Europe, shall be allowed to occupy the seat which he has held for the last four years.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman also asks unanimous consent that the same courtesy be extended to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEVENS.

No objection was made.

Mr. PRICE. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL DELEGATES.

Mr. PRICE. It has been suggested that before the drawing for seats it would be proper that the Delegates should be qualified. I simply suggest the matter for consideration.

The SPEAKER. There have been placed upon the Speaker's table by the Clerk the credentials of Delegates from the Territories of Idaho, Arizona, and Dakota, whose seats appear, so far as the knowledge of the Chair goes, to be uncontested. There are also conflicting credentials from the Territory of Colorado.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire to offer a resolution in connection with this subject.

The SPEAKER. A resolution on this subject, offered yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] was pending at the adjournment yesterday. If there be no objection, it will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House place upon the roll the names of Delegates from the several Territories whose credentials show prima facie that they were duly elected as such Delegates.

Mr. FARNSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that he withdraw this resolution, and let the credentials of the Delegates be presented to the House. In cases where there is no dispute, the Delegates can be sworn in; and where there is a dispute the House can make such disposition of the case as it may deem proper. In relation to the Colorado case, I desire to move that that case be referred to the Committee of Elections when it shall be appointed, with instructions to report to the House which claimant has the prima facie title to the seat.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My resolution simply proposes to apply with reference to Delegates the same rule which the law provides for with reference to members. It proposes that the Clerk of the House shall place upon the rolls the names of such Delegates as have credentials showing prima facie that they were duly elected. It appears to me a singular omission that a provision of this kind, corresponding with the provision in reference to members, was not embraced in the law. There is no propriety, so far as I can see, in applying to Delegates whose seats are contested a different rule from that applied to members whose seats are contested. Why should a Delegate whose credentials show a prima facie title to a seat be required to wait the decision of the Committee of Elections before being admitted? The adoption of my resolution will prejudice nobody, because the contestant from a Territory can present his case before the Committee of Elections just as a contestant from a State does.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think that the adoption of the resolution will prejudice the cases of some of these gentlemen, because they are all included in it, though the circumstances of the contest vary in different cases; and I think that some of these claimants are certainly entitled to an examination by the Committee of Elections of the question of prima facie title. In order to bring the House to a vote on this question I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not yield the floor for that motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not in order while the gentleman from Illinois retains the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The resolution certainly will not prejudice the rights of any contesting Delegate any more than the rights of contesting members are prejudiced by the law with reference to members from States, which requires the Clerk to place upon the roll the names of such members as shown by their credentials have prima facie title to their seats.

Mr. UPSON. Does the resolution of the gentleman include the Delegate from Colorado?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It includes all the Delegates from Territories who show by their credentials that they are duly elected.

Mr. UPSON. I would like the gentleman to give me a categorical answer.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have not examined the subject sufficiently to enable me to give a categorical answer to the question of the gentleman; but there is precedent for the action I propose. We have heretofore given a seat temporarily to a Delegate and afterward unseated him. In the Thirty-Eighth Congress, in the case of the Delegate from the Territory of Dakota, the House directed the name of Mr. Jaynes to be placed upon the roll, he holding a certificate issued by himself as Governor to himself as Delegate. Afterward he was unseated, and the seat was given to Mr. Todd, the contestant; and it so happens every year that some one is admitted to a seat and afterward unseated. I call the previous question on my resolution.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. What has been the practice heretofore in reference to Delegates who present prima facie evidence of election?

The SPEAKER. Until the enactment of the law under which this Congress has assembled and organized, the Clerk placed upon the roll the names of such as he saw proper to place there; unless he saw fit to refer it in some particular case to the House.

Mr. WOOD. I would inquire if there has been any instance in which any Delegate or member with a certificate has been denied his seat in the first instance?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question, and the Chair cannot attempt to answer it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask a question for information. I am not quite able to understand what will be the effect of adopting either of the two motions which have been made. I understand the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is that we shall proceed now to select the name of the man who shall take his seat as Delegate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That the Clerk shall do it.

Mr. STEVENS. Under the old rule I think the Clerk had the power to select the names; although the law which we have lately enacted omitted to include Delegates.

The SPEAKER. The law states that the Clerk shall place on the roll only the names of Representatives from those States represented in the preceding Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. Should not that be so construed as to include Delegates from Territories that had Delegates in the preceding Congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has conferred with the Clerk upon the subject, and the Clerk says that he does not think he has the right under the law to decide upon the prima facie credentials of Delegates, or to place their names upon the rolls, without further direction of the House.

In reference to the contest in regard to the seat of the Delegate from Colorado, the Clerk has informed the Chair that he does not know how to decide. The credentials of both claimants have the territorial seal, the one being signed by the Governor, the other by the majority of the board of canvassers.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would state that the claimant holding the certificate from the canvassers also has a certificate from the acting Governor of the Territory.

Mr. KOONTZ. I hope the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] will not prevail, for it makes the Clerk of the House the judge of the prima facie case. It will be remembered by the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress who are now here that the Committee of Elections were engaged for nearly three months in determining the prima facie right to a seat. And I think the Clerk of this House should not be made the judge of that question.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, to lay the resolution on the table; and being taken, there were—ayes 77, noes 47.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 41, not voting 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Luckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Briggs, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kelcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Polsley, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Stevens, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Baldwin, Barnes, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Calk, Chanler, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kerr, Logan, Marshall, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Van Tromp, and Wood—41.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Denison, Eggleston, Finney, Loan, Morgan, Spalding, Stewart, Robert T. Van Horn, and Welker—9.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

DRAWING OF SEATS.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest, while I am thankful to the House for having excepted me from the drawing of seats and allowed me to retain the one I have heretofore occupied, still I should be glad if the like privilege were accorded to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS.] I make that motion.

Mr. BANKS. I hope that will be done.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I object to it myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman cannot object, as he is interested; he has no right to object. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair must entertain the objection.

Mr. BANKS. He is interested, and under the rules has no right to object. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. He has the right to object to anything.

Mr. PAINE. His objection cannot be entertained, because he did not rise and object.

The SPEAKER. That is a good point, and the gentleman's objection will not be entertained.

Mr. STEVENS's motion was then agreed to unanimously.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the drawing for seats to take place immediately.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a motion in reference to papers—

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider has priority of every other motion except the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The object of my motion is to delay the drawing of seats until the unrepresented States, the unrepresented States of the North at least, are represented upon this floor. There are six or seven northern States which are not represented here. As this is a final drawing of seats I think it would be more becoming for us to postpone the drawing until the members from those absent States are here. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 43.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 34.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CHANLER. I suppose the effect of the motion is to wait until the southern States are admitted?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DELEGATES FROM TERRITORIES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the questions presented by the claimants from the Territory of Colorado for a seat upon this floor be referred to the Committee of Elections when appointed, with instruction to report which one of the contestants has the prima facie right to the seat, reserving to the other the right of contest. I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. We cannot deprive the Delegates of their seats in reference to which there is no contest. I ask the gentleman to modify his resolution to include that they shall be sworn in.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I accept that as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I think the gentleman from Iowa should make some provision for notice of contest.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I intend to leave that to the report of the committee.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROOM FOR DELEGATES.

Mr. BALDWIN: I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be directed to assign some suitable room for the common use of the Delegates from the Territories, which they can use for meetings for consultation, and for such other purposes as their business as Delegates may require.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had the allotment of rooms on this side for committees, and there not being rooms enough he had to assign two or three committees to one room. He was even compelled to take one of the reception rooms for the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest the Delegates be allowed to use the room of the Committee on Banking and Currency, as that committee did as little business at the last session as any. [Laughter.]

Mr. BALDWIN. I am satisfied there is great need for this resolution, but I will withdraw it for the present.

CORRECTION.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I rise to a personal explanation. I observe in the report of yesterday's proceedings as published by the Associated Press, that my name is omitted in the list of the signers of the protest read by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] I desire to make this explanation so the error may be corrected. It is right in the "Globe." I do not wish to be deprived of any merit of the act, nor to shrink from any responsibility connected with it.

ELECTION CONTEST—BIRCH VS. VAN HORN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the papers in the case of Birch vs. Van Horn, from the sixth congressional district of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

ELECTION CONTEST—STEWART VS. PHELPS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the papers in the case of Stewart vs. Phelps, from the third congressional district of Maryland; which were referred to the same committee, when appointed.

Mr. PHELPS presented some papers in the above case; which were referred to the same committee.

ELECTION CONTEST—McGRORTY VS. HOOPER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following telegraphic dispatch:

SALT LAKE CITY, March 1, 1887.

To EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk of the House:

Take notice, that I will contest the seat of William H. Hooper, Delegate for Utah in the Fortieth Congress. Notice sent by express.

WILLIAM McGRORTY.

The Chair will state that the credentials of the Delegates have not yet arrived by mail.

Mr. CHANLER. I would inquire if he is entitled, under the rule of the House, to contest a seat if he has more than one wife. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer any but parliamentary questions. [Laughter.]

DELEGATES SWORN IN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the credentials of three Delegates, whose seats are not contested, namely, from Idaho, Arizona, and Dakota. If there is no objection the Delegates will appear and take the oath of office. The remaining papers will be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. E. D. HOLBROOK, of Idaho; Mr. COLES BASHFORD, of Arizona; and Mr. WALTER A. BURLEIGH, of Dakota, accordingly appeared and took the oath of office as prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the tariff bill of the House, No. 718, of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, with the pending amendments, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object. I call for the regular order.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the drawing for seats, which must be done in accordance with the usage heretofore, which the Chair will state. With the exception of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] who are authorized by the resolution of the House first to select seats, all other members will retire beyond the outer row of seats. The seat formerly occupied by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] will be regarded as reserved for him. Members will remain at the outer row until their names are drawn, and each member as his name is drawn will select his seat and remain in it until the close of the drawing; otherwise he will lose his right to the seat chosen.

In execution of the order of the House members and Delegates retired beyond the outer row of seats, and as their names were drawn reappeared and selected their seats.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. BALDWIN. I move that the House now proceed to the election of Chaplain.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Nominations are now in order.

Mr. BALDWIN. I nominate Rev. Dr. C. B. Boynton.

Mr. PRUYN. I nominate Rev. Dr. Hall, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, of Washington.

Mr. RANDALL. I nominate Rev. John Chambers, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. NOELL. I nominate Rev. J. C. Berryman, of Missouri.

Mr. ROSS. I nominate Rev. Peter Cartwright, of Illinois.

Mr. HOLMAN. I nominate Rev. Dr. Charles Ager, of Aurora, Indiana.

Mr. PILE. I nominate Rev. Mr. Crary, of St. Louis.

Mr. DRIGGS. I nominate Rev. Ralph Hoyt.

Mr. BANKS. I nominate Rev. George H. Hepworth.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The State of Tennessee is not represented on this floor. In behalf of that State I nominate Rev. William G. Brownlow. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers to count the vote Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. PRUYN, Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. PILE.

The House proceeded to vote viva voce for

ASSISTANT STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. DAWES. With a view to complete the organization of the House, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the assistant stenographer of the last House be continued as such until otherwise ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of the member-elect from the State of Nebraska, who is now present, and I ask that he be sworn in.

Hon. JOHN TAFTE, Representative-elect from the State of Nebraska appeared, and having taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the law of July 2, 1862, took his seat.

PAY OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a select committee of six be appointed, consisting of three from the Senate and three from the House, whose duty it shall be to revise and equalize the pay of the employés of each House, and report a bill to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," for the purpose of having it referred to a select committee.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. PRICE. I move a suspension of the rules in order that I may introduce this bill and have it referred. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] would not object to the bill if he knew what it was.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before the question is put upon the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to state to the House that on Thursday next, should the House be in session on that day, he will announce the Committee of Elections, the Committee on the Rules, and the Committee on Mileage, three committees which are absolutely necessary, whether the House shall remain in session for three days or three months. It is true Rule 67 requires the Speaker to appoint all the committees of the House unless their appointment be otherwise ordered by the House. But for reasons which are obvious to every member, the Chair will not appoint any of the other committees, unless ordered by the House so to do. Of course, if the House desires the other committees to be appointed, and will so order, the Chair will appoint them.

And the Chair will also state that if there be no objection he will appoint as a member of the Committee on the Rules, the member from Illinois, now absent, Mr. WASHBURN, as he is the oldest member of the House in continuous service. Before Mr. WASHBURN left for Europe he subscribed to the oath of office and filed it with the Clerk of the House of Representatives; and although he has not been formally sworn in as a member of this House, still as the House recognized him as a member this morning by assigning a particular seat to him, the Chair supposes there will be no objection to the appointment of Mr. WASHBURN upon the Committee on the Rules on account of his seniority of service in this body.

No objection was made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire if it is expected that this House will remain in session and legislate for any length of time without having committees?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell in regard to that. But the House has already ordered that certain matters shall be referred to the Committee of Elections when appointed; and therefore it will be necessary to appoint that committee. And by a vote yesterday the House ordered the appointment of a Committee on the Rules.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would inquire if it is in order to introduce bills for reference to any of the committees when they shall have been appointed?

The SPEAKER. Whenever there shall be no other business before the House the States will be called for resolutions, under which call bills can be introduced for action or reference. When so introduced they can be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which at present has no Calendar, or to select committees; or to standing committees when appointed; that will be a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope no business will be inaugurated now. I think I had better move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is now pending, made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] withdraw his motion to adjourn, and yield to me for one minute by the clock?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must decline to yield.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the Chair if some matters were not referred to the Committee of Ways and Means yesterday?

The SPEAKER. There were no matters referred to that committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] asked leave to introduce some bill for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed, but objection was made.

The question was on the motion to adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of Governor Henry H. Crapo and numerous others, citizens of Michigan, praying that the five per cent. tax imposed upon manufactures may be wholly removed.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, asking for an appropriation for the construction of a break-water and light-house in the harbor of Port Austin, for the construction of harbors at the mouth of the Pentwater and Pere Marquette rivers, and for the survey of the harbor of Alpena, at the mouth of Thunder Bay river, and building a light-house and other improvements there; which were ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the Senate the report of Brevet Brigadier General James H. Simpson on the Pacific railroad and branches, submitted to him in February, 1867.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HARLAN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize and provide for the construction of a national military and freight railroad from the Mississippi river to certain points on the Atlantic coast.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 7) to guaranty a republican form of government in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, and to provide for the restoration of these States to practical relations with the Union; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. In introducing this bill, I desire to say that I do not forget that Congress has already passed what is known as the military bill, and which has in it certain elements of reconstruction; but at the time of the passage of that bill I did not disguise my sense of its incompleteness. It is not enough; it is not what the loyal people of the South have a right to expect from Congress. It contemplates reconstruction, but it does not supply proper machinery. Then again, such machinery as is to be employed is left in the hands of the existing governments, which the bill declares to be illegal. There seems to be a vital defect in the whole bill. I hesitate very much to criticize a measure which has in it so much of good, which asserts the complete jurisdiction of Congress over that whole region, and which ordains universal suffrage without distinction of color. But I am obliged to add my conviction that something more is needed in order to give to the loyal people of those States the protection which they have a right to expect. I have in my hands now a letter from Alabama, which was received yesterday, from one of the true loyalists there, in which he gives expression to his sentiments with regard to that bill. I will read only a brief extract; the letter is dated in Alabama, March 1, 1867:

"The military and reorganization bill passed by Congress will not do. It will result in again passing Alabama into rebel hands. The persons exempt from holding office and voting will effect nothing; the persons not exempted will control the State; so you may put down another failure. Negro votes under the bill will be used by rebels. The convention, if one is held, will be turned to rebel purposes."

And the letter concludes:

"I have no hope in the future of Alabama. The rebels have it, and will hold it under this bill."

Mr. JOHNSON. Who is the writer?

Mr. SUMNER. It is a very determined Unionist in the State of Alabama, surrounded at this moment by political foes. The Senate, therefore, will pardon me if I do not betray his name. Suffice it to say that it is a person well known to the Unionists here in Washington.

I do not now, however, propose to follow this subject any further. At some future day I may deem it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to it. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 8) to prescribe an oath to maintain a republican form of government in the rebel States; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to more than one reading of the bill to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that it be printed. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 9) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 3) construing and giving effect to the joint resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin, approved July 1, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 10) granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims in a certain cause involving the right to the use of a patent; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 11) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 12) to consolidate the southern and central superintendencies and certain Indian agencies, and to create an Indian superintendency for the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) for the relief of Daniel Ellis; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 5) declaring the municipal offices of Alexandria, Virginia, to be vacated; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I desire leave to introduce a bill of which notice has not been given, and I wish to say that it is a copy of a bill that was before the House of Representatives at the last session.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to introduce the bill (S. No. 13) granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 with Great Britain; and it was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

PAY OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a select committee of six be appointed, consisting of three from the Senate and three from the House, whose duty it shall be to revise and equalize the pay of the employés of each House, and report a bill to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN the resolution was taken up and concurred in.

COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, raised by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, be, and the same is hereby, revived and continued for and during the Fortieth Congress, with all the same powers and duties appertaining thereto in said Thirty-Ninth Congress, and with power to appoint a clerk, and with power in its members to administer oaths; and that any vacancies in said committee be filled by the Presiding Officer of each House respectively.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved. That the 34th rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto, after the words "a Committee on Finance," the words "a Committee on Appropriations, to consist of seven members."

The purpose is to divide the onerous labors of the Finance Committee with another committee.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, on Monday evening a newspaper was placed in my hand, in which I find a report of a committee of the last House of Representatives, submitted by Mr. HULBURD, of New York, which demands notice at my hands. It fills me with surprise and indignation. Without any notice to me, without calling upon me for any explanation, this report, by inference, and not by direct charge, by innuendo, not by positive avowment, endeavors to create the impression that I received or agreed to receive $5,000 or some other pecuniary or other benefit from Mr. Smythe, the collector of the port of New York. This charge, whether made directly or by implication, whether sought to be sustained by proof or innuendo, is absolutely and unqualifiedly false, and from whatever source it comes I pronounce it a base falsehood, a vile and cowardly slander.

I go further, sir, and say, that in the hundreds, and perhaps thousands of cases in which, during the ten years I have been in this body, my recommendation has been sought and obtained, there is not a single instance in which any kind of pecuniary consideration of the value of one cent was ever expected or received directly or indirectly by me; and I have yet to see that man upon this earth who would dare to look me in the face and make such an offer. Upon this and all other matters I am ready to meet the most searching scrutiny. So much for myself. But my duty is not yet done. The good name of my son has also been called in question. Upon this subject yesterday (Tuesday) morning, I prepared a statement to submit to the Senate, but I am told the testimony is not all published; I shall therefore withhold that statement. Meantime I will only say that when the truth is fully known there will be found nothing on his part dishonorable to his character as a soldier or as a citizen.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I see by the newspapers that I am involved in the same charge that is made against the Senator from Wisconsin, of having received $5,000 from Mr. Smythe. I will dispose of that in a very few words. There is no direct charge, but there is an innuendo that I was to receive $5,000 from the same person referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin. All I have to say that the document alluded to by him is false in its charges, false in its insinuations, and false in its innuendoes. I never received a copper from Mr. Smythe; and, if it were senatorial to say so, I would say that the insinuation is as false as hell. That is all I have to say.

PARIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) supplementary to other joint resolutions, to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867; which was introduced by me yesterday. It is the same resolution that during the last minutes of the late session failed to receive the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses. If it be taken up I will make a brief explanation in regard to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Secretary commenced to read the joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not. Let us finish this business.

Mr. GRIMES. This business ought to go to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 6, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Chaplain-elect, Rev. C. B. BOXTON, prayed as follows:

Almighty and eternal God, we thank Thee that through the night watches once more, Thou, O Shepherd of Israel! wert the keeper of us all. We come not only to offer thanksgiving for Thy preserving love, but to worship Thee as God over all, to extol Thee as King of Nations, to adore Thee as the God of progress, and to thank Thee that Thou hast so arranged the events connected with this nation, and the lives of these men now before Thee, as to make it possible that such a body of men should be assembled here, the latest expression of the wishes and sentiments of the American people.

And we bless Thee, O God, that on the very threshold of their very important deliberations they are willing to pause and commit their way unto Him who never errs. We thank Thee for all the guidance that we believe Thou hast granted unto the legislators who preceded them, and to many of these who, in another Congress represented, as they could, through Thine aid, the wishes and sentiments of the people of this country. Blessed be God, who did enable them then to accomplish so much.

And we ask Thee now to grant unto them and to their new associates here a wisdom which shall be sufficient to enable them to perform aright every one of the important duties of their station. And we pray Thee, that, as the result of the deliberations of this Congress, and of all the Departments of the Government associated with them, there may be peace and union, universal and perpetual, established over this whole country. And we know that Thou hast said there must be purity to precede peace, and there must be righteousness to render that peace stable. So may they not forget to lay the foundations that they are called upon to lay, and to carry up the superstructure that may be committed to them as master workmen, so that justice and the principles of the gospel of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, shall characterize it all.

May the blessings of God rest on this session and on every session of this Congress. We ask it in the name of Jesus. Amen.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

DELEGATE SWORN IN.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a question of privilege, and present the credentials of the Delegate-elect from the Territory of Utah.

Mr. WILLIAM H. HOOPER, of Utah, then appeared and took the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

CHAPLAIN-ELECT SWORN IN.

The Chaplain-elect, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, then appeared, and took the prescribed oath.

SINKING FUND FOR NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to introduce a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes not bearing interest to be used in providing a sinking fund for the extinguishment of the national debt.

The SPEAKER. At the adjournment yesterday the pending question was upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a bill for reference to a select committee.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. PRICE. My motion is to suspend the rules in order to enable me to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof;" and to have the same referred to a select committee, which shall include three members of this House, who were members of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the last Congress. And I will ask the reading of a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency upon this subject.

Mr. HARDING. I ask that the bill itself may be first read.

The bill was read. It provides that no national banking association, or any member thereof, shall, during the time it shall continue its banking operations, withdraw, or permit to be withdrawn, either in form of dividends or otherwise, any portion of its capital; and if losses shall at any time have been sustained by any such association equal to or exceeding its undivided profits then on hand, no dividend shall be made; and no dividend shall ever be made by any association, while it shall continue its banking operations, to an amount greater than its net profits then on hand, deducting therefrom its losses and bad debts; and all debts due to any association, on which interest is part due and unpaid for a period of six months, unless the same shall be well secured and shall be in process of collection, be considered bad debts within the meaning of this act. And when the Comptroller of the Currency shall have information that the capital stock of any association has been impaired by losses or bad debts to an amount exceeding one tenth of its paid-in capital, it shall be his duty to appoint an agent to investigate the affairs of such association, who shall report the amount of the deficiency; and the Comptroller of the Currency shall thereupon give notice to the president and board of directors of the association to make good the capital by an assessment on the stockholders, or to reduce the capital in the amount of losses sustained; and the board of directors shall have power, upon a vote of shareholders owning two thirds of the stock, to make an assessment upon the stock for an amount sufficient to cover the deficiency, which assessment shall be collectable in the manner prescribed in the fifteenth section of the act of which this is amendatory, for the collection of installments of capital stock, or to reduce the capital in the amount of the losses sustained, as provided in the thirteenth section of said act; and in default of either of these proceedings, the Comptroller of the Currency shall have power to appoint a receiver to wind up the affairs of the association.

Mr. PRICE. I now ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SPEAKER,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
WASHINGTON, March 5, 1867.

DEAR SIR: As the law now stands, the entire capital of a bank may be lost, the bank may be utterly insolvent, and may close its doors, and yet the Comptroller of the Currency has no power to act in the premises. I have three cases now pending where the capital of the bank has been impaired by dishonest practices on the part of the officers of the bank. I have instructed agents to examine and report the facts in these cases, and there my power ends, except so far as advice may go. I cannot compel the banks to make up these losses by assessment upon the stockholders; I cannot compel them to reduce their capital in the amount of losses sustained, nor can I appoint a receiver; and I respectfully request that you will present this amendment and urge its immediate passage, and that you will oppose any further amendments that may serve to complicate the matter or to retard immediate action.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. R. HULBURD, Comptroller.

Hon. HIRAM PRICE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PRICE. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know what the appropriate committee is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules to refer it to a select committee to be composed of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the last Congress who are members of this Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I am one of that number. It is proposed, then, to refer this to a resuscitated committee. If it be necessary, then we should have immediate action, and therefore I move, with the consent of the gentleman from Iowa, that we proceed to consider it at once.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman withdraws his motion to refer, and if the rules be suspended, the House can then proceed to consider it at once.

Mr. PRICE. I withdraw it.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules to consider this bill at the present time.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move as an amendment that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency when appointed a standing committee of this House. The proposition as made for the reference of this bill is unusual and unprecedented. The members of the last committee are not members of this House and practically it could not be carried out.

The SPEAKER. That has been withdrawn, and the gentleman moves to suspend the rules to consider it at the present time.

The rules were not suspended.

MARYLAND CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to a privileged question. I present the petition of J. J. Stewart contesting the right to a seat of Mr. PHELPS, and move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections with power to report any time.

The SPEAKER. They have the right to report any time.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. BROOKS. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to forthwith make personal inquiry into the seizures of champagne wines made by the New York custom-house in the year 1864, referred to in the recent report of the Committee on Public Expenditures; cause all such prosecutions to be discontinued if, in his opinion, the shippers or importers have not been guilty of willful negligence or any intention to defraud the revenue; and to make a report to this House of his action, embracing, among other things, a statement of the facts and circumstances upon which the importers rely for their defense.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he doubts whether this House could alone direct the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BROOKS. It does not direct, but only requests.

Mr. RANDALL. I object on the ground that it stops the prosecution of persons who have violated the law.

Mr. BROOKS. The Secretary of the Treasury has that power already, and my resolution only calls his attention to it. I move to suspend the rules, and I hope I will be allowed a word on the subject. Any member of the Committee on Public Expenditures which visited and took testimony in New York city who is within the sound of my voice, or any gentleman on the other side who read the report of the committee, will readily perceive the necessity for some such resolution, and I apprehend the necessity for some further action on the part of this House as well as other branches of the Government.

There is no positive direction in the resolution. The Solicitor of the Treasury has certain powers now. My object is to direct the attention of the Secretary to the fact. The principles embodied in the resolution arise from the suggestions of the Committee on Public Expenditures. Two persons, detectives of the Government, have been in Europe, assuming disguises and using counterfeit names and aliases, which is calculated to discredit the character of this Government abroad. The object of the resolution as well as of the Committee on Public Expenditures, is to call particular attention to the subject on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HULBURD. I ask the gentleman what action he contemplates under the resolution?

Mr. BROOKS. That it be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury for such action as in his judgment may be deemed expedient. I want his attention called to the fact. If the Committee on Public Expenditures had proposed any resolution at the conclusion of their report I should not have proposed any myself; but as they have left it without any proposition whatever, I deem it a duty I owe to my constituents and to the commercial interests of the country, as well as to its honor abroad, to ask for immediate action on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HULBURD. I suggest that this be laid on the table for the present.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no objection to having it lie over, so that it can be called up hereafter.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, and there being objection, it lies over.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS AND REVENUES.

Mr. HULBURD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with a statement showing what number of collectors of customs, naval officers, surveyors, inspectors of customs or aids to the revenue or other officers to prevent smuggling, have been removed and their places filled by others since the 3d of March, 1866; also how many additional inspectors or other officers of customs have been appointed since that date, and at what compensation; also what increase of compensation to officers of customs has been allowed since that date, particularizing the office or officer whose compensation has been increased, and the district to which he belongs; also a statement showing what has been the expenses of collecting the revenues from customs during the year the 31st of December, 1866; also what was the expenses of the same during the year ending the 31st of December, 1865, prepared so as to show the comparative expense for the two years.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information requires unanimous consent.

No objection being made, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HULBURD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WARD. I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas an ex-member of the Cabinet has declared in a public speech delivered at Boston that the testimony given on behalf of the Government on the trial of the assassins of the late President Lincoln was suborned, and that one of the accomplices of the said assassins, Mrs. Surratt, was convicted and executed without there having been any evidence of her guilt; and whereas the trial of said assassins was essentially national in its character, and the public honor requires that this grave and deliberate impeachment of the integrity of its proceedings shall be investigated and the truth declared: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed by the Speaker to examine thoroughly into said charges, and to report thereon, and that they have authority to send for all persons and papers which may be required in conducting said investigation.

Mr. WARD. I move the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest if this investigation is to be had it would be better to have a larger committee than three.

Mr. WARD. I have no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest another modification—that the committee sit with open doors.

Mr. WARD. I will amend by inserting five instead of three as the number of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. And also "with open doors."

Mr. WARD. I apprehend that is not usual, and I therefore can hardly accept it.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARDING. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WARD. As there seems to be opposition to the resolution, I have no wish to press it now, and will therefore withdraw it till tomorrow.

CUSTOM REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. WOOD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker to examine into the practical operation of existing laws for the collection of duties on imports, and to suggest amendments which shall secure a revenue to the Treasury, reduce the fees and emoluments of collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, and protect importers from oppression and unjust exaction, with power to take testimony and to sit during the recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the resolution gives rise to debate it must go over.

Mr. BROOMALL. I rise to debate the resolution.

The resolution accordingly went over.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers of Vincent Phelps.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the tariff bill, being House bill No. 718 of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, together with the pending amendments, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn; and thereupon (at twelve o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION, ETC.

The following petition, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. DODGE: The petition of 45 citizens of Harrison county, Iowa, against any further reduction of the currency.

By Mr. STEVENS: A memorial numerously signed by citizens of the State of New York, asking that republican forms of Government be provided for each of the States; that legal-tender notes be substituted for those bearing interest; and that a certain part of the property of the rebels be confiscated and sold.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 7, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing committees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to suspend the rule which requires, first the chairman, and then the respective members of each committee to be selected by ballot.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the rule is suspended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senators named in the list which I send to the Chair be elected to the places designated on the standing committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Rhode Island to offer a resolution. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it proper to state that the change made in the chairmanship of the Committee on Finance has been at the request of the distinguished Senator who for the last six years has filled that laborious office, so much to the satisfaction of the Senate and the benefit of the country. I presume no Senator would relieve him from that position except at his own request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island appointing the committees.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to inquire whether the joint Committee to Revise and Fix the Pay of the Officers of the two Houses has been filled, or whether the mode of filling it has been ordered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appointment of the committee has been ordered, but the mode of appointing it has not been designated.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move, then, that the following Senators be appointed upon that committee on the part of the Senate: Messrs. FESSENDEN, SHERMAN, and BUCKALEW.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to state that the members of the joint select Committee on Retrenchment on the part of the Senate are Mr. EDMUNDS, (chairman) Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. BUCKALEW.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer a resolution to amend the rules of the Senate, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the 30th Rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words, namely: "And all amendments to general appropriation bills reported from the committees of the Senate, proposing new items of appropriation, shall, one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the said committee."

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILLEY, it was

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Daniel Ellis be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HENDERSON. I give notice that on to-morrow or some future day I will ask leave to bring in a bill having provisions designed "to organize civil governments in the ten seceding States, now unrepresented in Congress, with a view and for the purpose of restoring at the earliest practicable moment the constitutional relations of said States to the Union."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

No. 18) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and to facilitate restoration; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 19) declaring a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near the town of St. Charles, and a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi river at or near the city of Louisiana, in the State of Missouri, to be legal structures and post roads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to hear that proposition read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. The article proposed to be added to the Constitution is, "That no State shall deny or abridge the right of its citizens to vote and hold office on account of race, color or previous condition," and giving Congress power to enforce the provision by appropriate legislation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the point of order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is that it is not in order now to attempt to amend the Constitution, that instrument having been blotted out of existence long ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 9) in favor of A. W. Walker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the bill (S. No. 12) to consolidate the southern and central superintendencies and certain Indian agencies, and to create an Indian superintendency for the Territory of Dakota, was taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) extending the time for the completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

Mr. HOWE. This resolution simply proposes to extend the time for completing the improvement of these rivers, the money for which is already deposited with the treasurer of Wisconsin. A similar resolution was reported by the Committee on Public Lands just before the adjournment of the late Congress, but too late to act upon it. It is very desirable that action should be had promptly. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution at the present time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Has it been investigated by any committee?

Mr. HOWE. I stated that it was reported from the Committee on Public Lands just before the adjournment of the late Congress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In this form?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir. The resolution as reported by the committee proposed to allow the improvement to be completed within such time and in such manner as the Legislature of Wisconsin might fix. This simply proposes to extend the time five years. The money required to complete the work has been ascertained by the judgment of a court, amounting to some sixty or seventy thousand dollars, and is on deposit with the treasurer of the State.

The joint resolution was read three times, and passed. It extends for five years from its approval the time provided for the completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers and the canal connecting the same, by section three of an act of Congress, approved August 8, 1846, entitled "An act to grant a certain quantity of land to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and to connect the same by a canal in the Territory of Wisconsin."

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the laws now in force relating to the internal revenue be printed for the use of the Senate, the same to be compiled under the direction and superintendence of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country, and a resolution for the adjournment of the House from Monday next to Wednesday the 8th of May, in both of which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

SENATE REPORTING.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask leave to submit a resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire whether any new or different arrangements from those now existing are necessary or expedient with regard to the reporting of the Senate proceedings and debates, and particularly as to the propriety of having the reporters under the direct control of and responsible immediately to the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask to have the resolution reported again.

The Secretary read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know from the author of that resolution—I cannot tell by the mere reading, though it does not appear to me to cover the case—whether he intends this inquiry to apply to the publishing also of the reports of all the proceedings of a given day on the following day. The publication of the proceedings of Congress in the Globe now, to my mind, is simply insufficient, badly done. The proceedings of different days are mixed together. Many days transpired at the end of the session before the proceedings of a given day were published in the Globe. I want to know whether the Senator who has offered this resolution proposes to require and have the committee investigate to that end, the publication of every day's proceedings on the morning of the following day. I think it is a necessity. I think it ought to be done. I think the present publication entirely insufficient and unsatisfactory, and I hope that the resolution will be modified if it is not now sufficient to cover that point. There is sufficient money paid in all probability by the Government to secure the prompt and full publication of the debates of this body, and of the other House also, promptly on each succeeding day; and I hope that hereafter it will be required to be done by the publishers of the Globe.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I offered the resolution in view of what took place in regard to the subject-matter on a former occasion, and the resolution is general in its terms, and I do not doubt that it is broad enough to cover the question referred to by the honorable Senator from California, although my attention had not been called particularly to that point. I should say that the resolution is broad enough in its terms to comprehend that, and, so far as I had any intention in regard to it, it was to send the whole question of the publication of the reports of the Senate to the committee for consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I hold in my hand the Globe of this morning, March 7. It contains on the first page the report of yesterday's proceedings, March 6. On the fifth column on the same page is the commencement of the proceedings of the Senate of Saturday, February 23; and still further on, in the third page of the same paper, are proceedings of the House of Representatives of Saturday, March

2. Such a conglomeration of the proceedings of Congress is not creditable to the Government. It is certainly not so to the publishers of the Globe. It shows, to my mind, conclusively that we do not get what we pay for, which is a prompt and certain publication of the proceedings of Congress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to the inquiry suggested by the resolution of the Senator from Maine. If we can, without disturbing the present system, place the reporters under the immediate control of the Senate, make them officers of the Senate, their compensation to be paid by Congress, I have no objection to that; but I do not agree with the Senator from California that the Globe is not well conducted, and that it is not a success. I say, from my knowledge of the continuous sessions toward the close of the last session of Congress, it was physically impossible to keep the reports up from day to day; and I do not care what change you may make about it, if Congress will sit day and night that thing cannot be done. The reporters may report what we say, but they cannot translate so as to throw into print on the next morning what we say all day and all night and until the hour of the publication of the paper.

I had observed what the Senator from California has called the attention of the Senate to. I suppose that was a matter of convenience, so as to let the country at once know what was done at the commencement of this session of Congress. We all know that it was impossible to have completed the publication of the proceedings of the last days of the last session, because we sat almost continuously, and much of the time there was continuous debate. That could not be completed at the close of the session, and never has been, and I suppose never will be. Night sessions make that impossible.

Now, where the fault is, if there is any fault, that the Senate proceedings are so far behind the House proceedings I will not undertake to say. The Senator has called attention to the fact that the proceedings of the House are published to-day up to the 2d of March; and the proceedings of the Senate are behind that. I do not believe it is with the reporters; I do not suppose it is with the translators; I do not suppose there is any fault in the type-setters. With night sessions nearly all the while, I think there is no fault anywhere in all probability; but they have all diligently done their duty. Some things cannot be accomplished. To report the proceedings of a body that is talking night and day is a very difficult work, and it is undertaking an impossibility to ask that their proceedings shall appear in print ten minutes after we stop speaking. It cannot be done; and the matter the Senator complains of is of no sort of consequence, for the debates will fall into their proper position and shape in the Congressional Globe as published and bound. This is the Daily Globe furnished to us for our convenience and to the country. The Congressional Globe, as I understand, has the proceedings regularly from day to day, without interruption, just as they take place, except in the cases where members hold their speeches out for the purpose of correction, and those speeches fall out of their natural position because the members themselves withhold them and they go into the Appendix. That is no fault of the reporters or the Globe or anybody else, except the member that sees fit to have his speech so published. I believe that the Globe is a success. The reports are remarkably accurate. When published in book form the whole proceedings of Congress appear in their regular order.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not say that the Globe was not a success. I think perhaps it is to the publishers. But I said that the publication of the reports of Congress was not a success, and that is palpable upon the face of the pages of this morning's issue. I did not intend to, and I did not while up, blame the reporters. I rather think the blame is in the present system. I do not agree with the honorable Senator when he says that a certain thing cannot be done. I think all that may be done can be done by an increase of the force at the end of a Congress, which in all probability it will be found, upon due investigation by the committee, the Globe proprietors are fully able to do.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator has touched another point, and I think that ought to come under investigation, namely, this habit of withholding speeches that are made here to be dressed up, to be made presentable, to be published as they were not made; and thus they fall, as the Senator says, into the Appendix. But he says the debates are published in proper order in the regular issues of the Congressional Globe, and that is not this Daily Globe. Yes, sir, those speeches go to the bourn in the Congressional Globe from whence no news returns to the people. That is precisely what I think ought not to be. I think as near as it can be done, and it can be done almost completely, the publication of each day's proceedings should appear the next day; and this habit of withholding speeches, suppressing matter uttered here, interpolating or interjecting matter never uttered here, reorganizing and reconstructing sentences—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. If the honorable Senator will allow me to finish my sentence I will do so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Reconstructing sentences, presenting speeches to constituencies as they were not made here, ought to cease. If I had the power I would have every utterance taken down by the reporter and make it impossible that any of those utterances should be changed, so that we should all and every person who speaks should be published to his constituency precisely as he utters words here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would not wish the Senator to extend my suggestion any further than it naturally goes. I made no fault with any Senator for any change of his speech. If any Senator is dissatisfied with his speech and wants to make it better afterwards, I have no objection if it does not interfere with me in any way. It is a matter of taste between him and his constituents. I do not think there is much of that thing done in the Senate. I have not observed it in any case, I believe. The debates in the Senate are upon the questions before the body, and are very seldom reduced to writing before their delivery. In the House I have heard something of the sort talked of that the Senator now suggests; but it is not my business to comment upon the character of the debates of the House. The duties of the reporters in the House are less than they are in the Senate, because of the fact, as I have understood, that many of the speeches in the House are written out in advance, while the debates in the Senate are almost purely extempore; and that makes it harder on our reporters than upon the reporters of the House.

But I do not care if a Senator chooses to change his speech if he does not interfere with the running debate, so as to place some other Senator in the wrong. For myself I do not choose to do that, because it forces a labor on me that I do not want to go through with, to look over the notes.

Mr. ANTHONY. There has been an unfortunate difference between the reporter of the Senate and the publishers of the Globe, about the merits of which I do not presume to speak; I am not sufficiently informed; but there has been a delay in the publication of the proceedings of the Senate that shows there is blame somewhere, because the Senate debates are a week behind the House; and although at this period of the session it is very difficult—not impossible, not impracticable, but very difficult—to keep the debates up in full, I do not see why there should be so great a difference between the reports of the House and of the Senate. Undoubtedly the speeches in the House are to a much greater extent written than those in the Senate; it does not require the translating of the stenographic notes to such an extent; but the debates ought to be printed promptly, and they can be. Perhaps there is no fault under our present system; perhaps the system itself is in fault, and there should be a greater force employed here at the close of the session. The British Parliament meets at four o'clock and adjourns frequently not until sunrise, and the London Times always has a full report in, a very long report—

Mr. JOHNSON. And it appears the next morning always.

Mr. ANTHONY. The next morning about nine o'clock. They take the report and print it as the debate is going on. I do not suppose we have arranged for that. I do not suppose that under our contract with the publishers of the Globe we have a right to require it. We require of them, I understand, the publication of a certain number of columns daily, and that part of the contract they have fulfilled. But there should be some arrangement, there should be a contract by which we should have even at the close of the session every morning the debates of the preceding day, at least up to sunrise, if we sit all night. I think it is proper there should be some investigation of this matter, and it is proper that we should ascertain whether any one is at fault; at least we should not allow a quarrel between the reporter and the publishers to keep our reports back. Of course we only know the publishers of the Globe. We contract with them and we hold them responsible, and the reporters are responsible to them.

The resolution was adopted.

COMMITTEE-ROOMS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to provide a room for the Committee on Appropriations, and generally to reassign the several committee-rooms so far as such reassignment may be necessary.

DUTIES ON WOOL AND WOOLENS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 5.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to offer resolutions which I wish to have printed?

Mr. SHERMAN. This will take but a moment. I move to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 5) to extend the time for taking effect of the act relating to wool and woolsens. It proposes to amend the act of the last session relating to the duties on wool and woolsens so as to take effect ten days after the passage of this act; and all duties paid under that act in excess of the amount of duties in force on the 1st day of March are to be refunded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I introduced this bill for the purpose of avoiding a practical difficulty in the enforcement of the law in regard to wool and woolsens, but I find, on conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury and also by his letter, which I send to the desk to be read, that the construction put upon that law will relieve the subject from the difficulty I anticipated. I should like to have the letter read.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 6, 1867.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, requesting to be informed as to the construction put by this Department on the recent act relating to wools and woolsens, particularly as to its effect upon goods in bonded warehouse.

I am of opinion that the rates of duty imposed by the tariff act referred to, cannot be held to apply to goods in bond at the time the act goes into effect, in the absence of an express provision of law applying the new rates to goods in that condition.

I am, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, United States Senate Chamber,

Mr. SHERMAN. I find by reference to the law that the duties levied by the new act only apply to goods imported from foreign countries. The construction of the Department has always been that importation is complete when goods are put in bond. If so, it does not apply to goods in bond. That will substantially accomplish the purpose of this bill, and therefore I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair resolutions which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions declaring certain further guarantees required in the reconstruction of the rebel States.

Resolved, That Congress, in declaring by positive legislation that it possesses paramount authority over the rebel States, and in prescribing that no person therein shall be excluded from the elective franchise by reason of race, color, or previous condition, has begun the work of reconstruction, and has set an example to itself.

Resolved, That there are other things remaining to be done which are as clearly within the power of Congress as the elective franchise, and it is the duty of Congress to see that these things are not left undone.

Resolved, That among the things remaining to be done are the five following:

1. The existing governments which have been declared to be illegal must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction, and will cease to exercise a pernicious influence.

2. Provisional governments must be constituted as temporary substitutes for the illegal governments, with special authority to superintend the transition to permanent governments republican in form.

3. As loyalty beyond suspicion must be the basis of permanent governments republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

4. As the education of the people is essential to the national welfare, and especially to the development of those principles of justice and morality which constitute the foundation of republican government, and as according to the census an immense proportion of the people in the rebel States, without distinction of color, cannot read and write, therefore public schools must be established for the equal good of all.

5. Not less important than education is the home-stead, which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

Resolved, That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senate is disposed to act on these resolutions now I should be glad.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. I move then that they be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PARIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of joint resolution No. 2, which is on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) supplementary to other joint resolutions to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867.

It provides that the commission of the United States at the Universal Exhibition to be held at Paris in 1867 shall consist of the commissioner general and honorary commissioner, whose appointment was approved by the joint resolution of January 22, 1866; also of the thirty commissioners whose appointment was provided for by the joint resolution of July 5, 1866, and of twenty commissioners, whose appointment is herein provided for.

The commissioner general is to be the president of the commission thus constituted, with a vote on all questions that may arise. The commission is to meet at Paris as early as possible before the opening of the Exhibition, upon the call of the commissioner general, and when properly organized is to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for efficient action, with power to elect a vice president from their own number, who, in the absence of the commissioner general, is to preside at all meetings of the commission, and to appoint committees and chairmen of groups. The commission may designate additional persons, not exceeding twenty in number, being citizens of the United States, known to be skilled in any branch of industry or art, who are authorized to attend the Exhibition in behalf of the United States as honorary commissioners without compensation. The commission may employ a secretary and clerks for the commission, the necessary scientific assistants and draftsmen, and may engage suitable rooms for the commission. No commissioner is to act as agent for the show or sale of any article at the Exhibition, or be interested, directly or indirectly, in any profits from any such article. Fifty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, are appropriated for additional freights from New York to Havre; for transportation and freight from Havre to Paris; for return freight of articles owned by the United States or lent to the Government by individuals; for marine and fire insurance on the articles thus lent; for additional steam-power at Paris, in the "palace" and the "annex," or supplemental building, and in grounds adjacent; for the exhibition of machines, agricultural and other, and for the erection of buildings to illustrate the education and agriculture of the United States; for the necessary expense of collecting, classifying, labeling, and packing mineralogical and metallurgical specimens, to complete the exhibition of the mineral wealth of the United States; and for the necessary expense of laborers and extra service in the offices at Paris and New York, and for the expenses of a secretary, clerks, scientific assistants, and draftsmen, rooms, and other incidental expenses of the commission. The general agent at New York, and the commissioner general at Paris, are to transmit to Congress, through the Department of State, a detailed statement of the manner in which the expenditures thus authorized are made by them respectively.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to make a brief statement with regard to this joint resolution. It is, with an amendment which I propose to send to the Chair, precisely the resolution which passed the two Houses during the last hour of the last session, and a copy of which as enrolled I now hold in my hands. It seems that the enrolment was not completed till within a very few minutes of twelve o'clock, and it failed to secure the signatures of the officers of the two Houses, and of course was never presented to the President; but it had passed both Houses in the form in which it is now before the Senate. It may be remembered that the House cut down the appropriations of the Senate to $50,000. During the last hour of the session the Senate concurred with the amendment of the House; so that this measure as between the two Houses was a completed act. It has however failed through the want of the signatures of the proper officers, and I have deemed it my duty, with this statement, to present the matter thus early to the attention of the Senate, without however undertaking in any way to open the main question. Were I disposed to discuss that, I should fall back on the original resolution as it passed the Senate, but I confine myself now to asking the Senate to adopt the measure which received the concurrent votes of both branches of Congress, and which, as I have already said, failed through a want of time or an accident. I am not prepared to say that there was any negligence in any quarter. It was probably from the inherent difficulty of the case. Senators will remember that two years ago there was a bill very much in this predicament. There was an appropriation for a private claim which had passed both bodies, but which failed to be enrolled. I think at that time there was some unaccountable negligence of one of the clerks. At a subsequent session that bill was taken up in the very form in which it was left, and passed by both Houses. I now ask that Congress should do the same in regard to this measure. I think indeed it can have no hesitation. This appropriation is needed. Without it our representation at Paris must fail miserably. In order to complete the conformity of the resolution with that which passed the House. I move an amendment to come in on page 3, line fifteen, immediately after the words "United States:"

And for the collection of specimens of agricultural productions under the joint resolution for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 7, 1867.

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House of Representatives adjourns on Monday next, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 8th of May next, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that that resolution lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 7, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, inclosing a letter from the Secretary of State, acknowledging the receipt of the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and announcing his purpose to promulgate it; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from John Hogan, informing the House that he contests the right of WILLIAM A. PILE to a seat in the House from the first congressional district of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a telegram from the members of the South Carolina Mission Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, now in session at Charleston, South Carolina, in reference to the passage of the reconstruction bill; which was laid on the table.

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from B. B. French, late Commissioner of Buildings, urging the appointment of the joint committee of the two Houses provided for by the provision of the deficiency appropriation bill making an appropriation to complete the repairs and furnishing of the Executive Mansion; which was laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF INDIAN COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, asking that an appropriation of $20,000 be made to pay the expenses of the commission appointed by the President to proceed to the Indian country and investigate the causes of the troubles among the Indians there; which was laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. In connection with the subject embraced in the communication just read, I ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation for the expenses of the commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country.

No objection was made; and the bill was introduced, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It appropriates the sum of $20,000 to pay the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. POMEROY. I offer the following resolution, which is privileged, and upon it I call the previous question.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the Senate and House of Representatives adjourn on Monday next, they respectively adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 8th day of May next, at twelve o'clock noon.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. MUNGEN. I desire to move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "8th day of May" and inserting the words "first Monday in December."

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not in order at this time, pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will it be in order to move to amend the resolution should the call for the previous question not be seconded?

The SPEAKER. If the call for the previous question shall not be seconded, amendments will be in order.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] withdraw his call for the previous question for a moment?

Mr. POMEROY. For what purpose?

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to suggest a modification of the resolution, which I think should be made.

Mr. POMEROY. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. As the resolution now reads it provides for an adjournment of both Houses on Monday next. It may be that the Senate will not be prepared to adjourn by that time. I think the resolution should be modified so as to provide only for an adjournment of the House. If the Senate are of opinion that they can properly adjourn on Monday next, they can amend the resolution to that effect.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the suggestion of the gentleman is a very proper one; and I accordingly modify the resolution so as to provide only for the adjournment of the House on Monday next.

The resolution, as modified, was as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House of Representatives adjourn on Monday next, it be to meet on Wednesday, the 8th day of May next, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would suggest another modification of the resolution. I suppose that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] desires to provide that the House shall take a recess from Monday next to the day named. If that is his meaning he should say so in the resolution, for it is manifest that the one House cannot adjourn without the other.

Mr. POMEROY. I will state that the language of the Constitution is—

"Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days."

I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, nays 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the whole subject be laid on the table; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 102, not voting 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Burr, Chanler, Driggs, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravelly, Hill, Holman, Loan, Logan, Marshall, McClurg, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Randall, Ross, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Van Aiken, Robert T. Van Horn, and Van Tromp—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Griswold, Haight, Hasley, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulbert, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketchum, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Neill, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Raun, Robertson, Robinson, Sawyer, Seofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Talle, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Hurt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—102.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Benjamin, Brooks, Calk, Cook, Cullom, Denison, Finney, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Kerr, Pike, Poland, Schenck, Selye, Smith, Stevens, Van Aornam, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—24.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

The main question was then ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. POMEROY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the resolution of the House providing for the appointment of a select committee to revise and equalize the pay of the employees of each House.

It further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the continuance of the joint Committee on Retrenchment during the Fortieth Congress; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 6, 1867.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, raised by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, be, and the same is hereby, renewed and continued for and during the Fortieth Congress, with all and the same powers and duties appertaining thereto in said Thirty-Ninth Congress, and with power in its members to administer oaths; and that any vacancies existing in said committee be filled by the Presiding Officer of each House respectively.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the question of concurrence debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope that committee will not be again renewed. From the beginning it has been engaged in destroying the Union instead of preserving it.

The SPEAKER. This is a resolution in reference to the joint Committee on Retrenchment, and not the joint Committee on Reconstruction. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. My remarks apply to the latter committee.

The resolution was concurred in.

REORGANIZATION OF REBEL STATES.

Mr. KELLEY. I submit the following resolution, and if objection be made I shall move to suspend the rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill declaring who shall call conventions for the reorganization of the rebel States, and providing for the registration of voters within said rebel States; and all elections for members of said conventions, or for the adoption or rejection of constitutions formed by said conventions, or for the choice of public officers, State and municipal, until the constitutions of said States shall have been approved by Congress, shall be by ballot.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order. The resolution proposes to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary. I submit that there is no Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLEY. I modify the resolution so as to say "the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] modifies the resolution. But the Chair would, at any rate, overrule the point of order; because the rules specify that there shall be a Committee on the Judiciary, and it is only a question of time as to the appointment of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order: that debate arising on the resolution, it must go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has announced his intention to move to suspend the rules, including of course the rule which would require the resolution to go over.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to suspend the rules so as to allow the introduction of the resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 31, not voting 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lafin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Plants, Polesley, Pomerooy, Price, Raun, Robertson, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Prayn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Wood—31.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banks, Blaine, Denison, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Loan, Pike, Pile, Poland, Schenck, Selye, Stewart, and Thomas—18.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is now before the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. NIBLACK called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 33, not voting 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook,

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banks, Griswold, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, Phelps, Pike, Selye, Stewart, and Thomas—13.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regards the resolution just adopted as instruction to him to appoint a Committee on the Judiciary at this session.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Very well.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, of the condition of the public fund as affected by the tenure-of-office act, so called, and the numerous vacancies in the subordinate offices of the Treasury Department and of the Post Office Department.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor, and unless he surrenders it for that purpose the motion cannot be made.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I hold in my hand the petition of loyal men of Virginia, asking Congress to pass certain laws providing for carrying out the recent act of Congress for the better government of the rebel States. I ask that it may be printed and read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to having the petition read?

Mr. CHANLER. Better have it read first and printed afterward. [Laughter.]

No objection being made the petition was read, as follows:

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, citizens of Alexandria, Virginia, desire to make known to your honors that the military reconstruction bill, passed by Congress on the 2d of March, has been openly defied by the authorities of this city in the election just held for municipal officers.

That bill distinctly and positively enfranchised the colored citizens of the "rebel States," yet the men controlling the government of Alexandria utterly refused to receive and count their votes, or even to record the names of such as endeavored to exercise this right, and they based their refusal upon the ground that the laws of Virginia are paramount to those of the United States.

Although one thousand five hundred and nineteen votes were cast for the Union candidates—a large number of them by discharged Union soldiers—and only one thousand one hundred and one votes for both the disloyal tickets—many of these being cast by returned rebel soldiers—yet the existing provisional government insists upon ignoring the Union vote and declaring the candidate of the opposite party elected mayor, although he received only five hundred and eighty-two votes, and is, moreover, disqualified by the law above referred to from holding the office.

Before it was fully determined to boldly violate the law, disloyal employers threatened to discharge their employees if they dared to vote the Republican ticket. Moreover, it was openly asserted upon the streets that blood would be spilt if the colored people attempted to vote, and your memorialists are fully satisfied that nothing but the known presence of troops sent from Washington prevented a riot.

However, being protected by the military, the Union men of the city opened polls of their own, at which over fourteen hundred votes were cast by white and colored men. We have taken this step so as to prove to members of your honorable bodies and to the world that the Union men of the South are numerous enough and determined enough to do their duty if Congress will only pass such laws as are needed to secure safe and fair elections.

It must be evident to every man that when the law is contemptuously defied within actual sight of the Capitol, where nothing but the presence of a military force prevented the murder of good and true men for simply attempting to exercise the franchise with which the nation had invested them, that it is folly to expect a faithful observance of the law throughout the rebel States generally.

Longing for a speedy loyal reconstruction of the Union, and knowing that it will be impossible to secure it under the provisions of the "military reconstruction bill," we desire to bring to your notice the following important defects in that measure:

1. Although there are not soldiers enough in the country (who can be spared for the purpose) to guard one-fiftieth of the polls, the bill makes no provision for organizing a loyal militia force.

2. The disloyalists, whose apparent interest it is to nullify the law, fill every office, from the highest to the lowest. They are the judges and clerks of elections; they receive and count the votes; they make and receive the returns, and they decide who are elected. The history of the last thirty years has proved that these men will commit any and every outrage and crime which seems to be necessary to carry their points, and we distinctly say to you and the country that, even if they should pretend to acquiesce in the law, it is certain that they will browbeat and swindle enough to carry every election. A loyal reconstruction is possible only through the assistance of loyal election officers.

3. It is known by everybody that the disloyalists hate the Unionists of both races with a perfect hatred, are continually hunting them down and murdering them without even a pretense of provocation, and yet these unarmed and unorganized Union men are expected to meet all their foes at the polls and vote them out of power. If this is attempted there will be riots all over the South, and the responsibility for them and for the blood which will be shed will rest upon the souls of those members of Congress who insist upon bringing gunpowder and fire together. Distinctly and solemnly we say to you, gentlemen, that peaceful elections cannot be secured unless the arrogant, domineering, blood-thirsty disloyal element is kept from the polls entirely, until such time as it shall have become at least partially purified, or the loyal element organized and thoroughly entrenched in power.

4. It is also absolutely necessary that there should be a registration of voters, so that all disfranchised individuals may have due notice not only that they are disqualified, but that that fact is known. They would be apt then to stay away from the polls.

We feel ourselves impelled to say here that the bill known as the Louisiana bill would, if made applicable to all the non-reconstructed States, secure a peaceful loyal reorganization of the South, and we respectfully, but earnestly, urge that it, or something akin to it, be immediately passed into a law. There are two amendments, however, which we suggest even to that bill, namely:

1. That no person having an honorable discharge from the Army or Navy of the United States shall be disqualified from voting or holding office on account of previous complicity in the rebellion; and,

2. That it should be made the duty of the Governor and council, from time to time, to prepare lists of all, except certain classes of the disfranchised persons, who are now truly loyal, and send them to Congress to have their disabilities removed.

The apparent harshness of the sweeping disfranchisement of that bill would thus be removed without endangering its successful working. If the Governor and council are good men they will not present the names of disloyal persons, and if they prove to be bad men Congress can refuse to regard their recommendation. And if they fail to carry out this provision in a liberal spirit, Congress can take such further action as it sees fit in the premises.

We are unalterably opposed to the perpetual disfranchisement of any considerable class in the community, but we do ask that all rebels should be compelled to climb upon the Union platform before their forfeited political rights are restored to them.

Thanking Congress for the enfranchisement of our colored people, and hoping that it will not wait before passing the yet needed laws until the blood of hundreds more murdered Union men cries out from the ground against its members for their delay, we remain, very respectfully,

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to reconsider the reference.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I call the previous question on the motion to refer.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. I am not to be silenced in this way. The Chair announced that the petition had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair decided that emphatically, and thereupon I rose and moved to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will overrule the point of order. The gentleman from New York has served long enough in the House to be apprised of the fact that when a gentleman makes a motion, unless some gentleman rises and objects, the House is considered as concurring in the motion. The gentleman is also aware of the fact that the gentleman who presents a paper is entitled to the floor if it is debated.

Mr. BROOKS. One word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot argue the question, but overrules the point of order. The gentleman may take an appeal.

Mr. BROOKS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me state the point of order. When the Chair announces that a matter is referred to a committee the matter has been referred, and it is a final decision upon the question. Such was the announcement in this case, and thereupon the member who had the floor lost his title to it. I then rose and moved to reconsider the question and to speak on that question, and I claim that I had the right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BROOKS. The floor was abandoned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] when the Chair announced that his motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman is mistaken. I had not abandoned the floor.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is confirmed by the reporters of the Globe, who heard him say that if there was no objection the petition would be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROOKS. I will move to reconsider the vote by which the reference was made.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] is entitled to the floor, if he claims it.

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I now insist on the previous question on my motion to refer the petition.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being upon the motion to refer.

Mr. CHANLER. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CHANLER and SHELLABARGER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 29.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLABARGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the petition was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield now to my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] to offer a resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Paymaster General of the Army

be directed to communicate to this House a tabular statement, accompanied by proper explanations, which shall clearly exhibit the full and exact amount of compensation paid by the Government to each and every grade of officers in the United States Army, indicating distinctly and separately the amount of pay proper, and the amount of each allowance or commutation of allowance, either in kind or in money, and the aggregate of pay and allowances to every officer, according to his grade or rank and length of service.

Mr. STEVENS. In connection with the resolution just adopted, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill—with a view to put it upon its passage—a bill to repeal an act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I will move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield for that purpose, but I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS.]

CONGRESSIONAL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. ROSS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be granted to the Congressional Temperance Association on Sunday evening next.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to yield me the floor for a moment that I may offer a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the President of the United States, is hereby requested to communicate to this House all correspondence, documents, and proceedings in possession of the Departments relating to the arrest, imprisonment, and treatment of American citizens in Great Britain, or its Provinces within two years last past.

PROTECTION OF MICHIGAN FISHERIES.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, asking for the protection of the fisheries in the upper peninsula of that State to the people of the State and the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENDOWMENT OF FEMALE COLLEGES.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, asking an appropriation of land by Congress to endow female colleges in the several States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVIGATION IMPROVEMENT IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan asking for a grant of land to said State to aid in deepening the channel between Lake Superior and Eagle Harbor, in the county of Keweenaw; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UPSON. I ask unanimous consent to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan.

Mr. HARDING objected.

DISMISSAL OF ILLINOIS SOLDIERS.

Mr. HARDING asked unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be respectfully requested to communicate to this House the information contained in the War Department relative to the dismissal of soldiers of company B, fifty-eighth regiment of Illinois volunteer infantry from the service of the United States.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I rise to a question of privilege, and present the following resolution:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Ninth Congress adopted, on the 7th of January, 1867, a resolution authorizing an inquiry into certain charges preferred against the President of the United States; and whereas the Judiciary Committee, to whom said resolution and charges were referred, with authority to investigate the same, were unable for want of time to complete said investigation before the expiration of the Thirty-Ninth Congress; and whereas in the report submitted by said Judiciary Committee on the 2d of March they declare that the evidence taken is of such a character as to justify and demand a continuation of the investigation by this Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Judiciary Committee, when appointed, be, and they are hereby, instructed to continue the investigation authorized in said resolution of January 7, 1867, and that they have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer the customary oath to witnesses; and that the committee have authority to sit during the sessions of the House and during any recess which Congress or this House may take.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be requested to appoint the Committee on the Judiciary forthwith, and that the committee so appointed be directed to take charge of the testimony taken by the committee of the last Congress; and that said committee have power to appoint a clerk at a compensation not to exceed six dollars per day, and employ the necessary stenographer.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will hear it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The amendment which I desire to offer is to add to the resolution the following:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House, on the order of the Committee on the Judiciary, such sum or sums of money as may be required to enable the said committee to prosecute the investigation above directed, and such other investigations as it may be ordered to make.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I accept that amendment as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution will bring the House to a vote on a question of transcendent importance. It brings us face to face with a man whose usurpations have imperiled the Republic. We cannot escape the consideration of this question if we would, and we ought not if we could. The report which the Judiciary Committee of the last House made on Saturday is a sufficient vindication of the action of that body on the charges presented looking to the impeachment of the President. It is a report which the moral sense of this nation will approve. It is to be regretted that that committee were not authorized at an earlier day to proceed with this investigation, so that they might have completed it and presented the case for final action by the last Congress. All true men who have examined this matter impartially can but regret our inability to secure earlier action.

But I think I may without hazard express the opinion that there is no cause for discouragement; that the foundations have been so carefully laid that the machinations of the conspirators and their chief, with all the immense power and patronage in his hands, will be unable long to stay the doom which awaits him. It is, sir, to go upon the record of this House, and it will go into history, that the people of the United States will never permit any President to usurp the prerogatives of the law-making power; nor will they permit him to defy the deliberately recorded verdict of the nation. They will permit no man—certainly no man who came into the Presidency through the door of assassination—

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Is debate in order at this stage of proceeding?

The SPEAKER. Debate is in order.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is the resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is before the House as a question of privilege.

Mr. NIBLACK. By a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. A question of privilege does not require a suspension of the rules to bring it before the House. When the Chair has decided any question to be a question of privilege—and the decision is of course subject to appeal—it comes before the House at once.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Chair state what this question of privilege is? I have been unable to find out what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has entertained the resolution as a question of privilege, as it has reference to proceedings for the impeachment of the President of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What question has the gentleman offering the resolution the right to discuss?

The SPEAKER. The whole scope of the resolution.

Mr. WOOD. Has the gentleman the right to go into the merits of the question of impeachment?

The SPEAKER. By parliamentary law the question of referring a resolution or bill always opens the entire subject for discussion.

Mr. WOOD. Then I understand the Chair to say that it is entirely in order on this proposition to discuss the whole question involved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that there is any limit.

Mr. WOOD. I only desire it shall be understood. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] will proceed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I was saying when interrupted that the people of this country will never permit any man—certainly no man who came into the Presidency through the door of assassination—to use the vast powers with which the Executive of this country is clothed in defiance of Congress and the people. That the acting President has done all this and more will not be seriously denied. His usurpations of power have been in clear violation of the Constitution, and many of his acts tend directly to revolution. In fact, the message to which we were all compelled to listen on last Saturday, returning with his objections the reconstruction bill, was but an invitation to revolution and civil war. If any loyal man had doubted before, he could doubt no longer, that while this man remains in the presidential office there can be no tranquillity in this country, no security for property, liberty, and life to loyal citizens in the South, no such restoration of this Government as the Union Army and the Union citizens of this nation have decreed, no safety for a single hour from rebellion or revolution.

Sir, a man of Mr. Johnson's antecedents, of his mental and moral caliber, coming into the Presidency as he came into it—and I say nothing now of the dark suspicion which crept over the minds of men as to his complicity in the assassination plot, nor of the fact, that I cannot banish from my mind, the mysterious connection between death and treachery which this case presents—I say such a man, in view of all that has happened, coming into the presidential office as he came into it, ought to have walked with uncovered head and very humbly before the loyal men of this nation and their Representatives in the American Congress.

Mr. Speaker, if this nation does not stamp with the broad seal of its condemnation the usurpations and crimes and misdemeanors of this man it will be but an invitation in the future for a repetition of these usurpations, crimes, and misdemeanors.

Self-protection and a proper respect for the honor of the nation demand that the Representatives of the people shall declare, in a manner not to be misunderstood, that no man hereafter elected President or Vice President shall present himself at his inauguration drunk; that no man discharging the duties of the office of President of the United States shall be permitted to turn the White House into a den of thieves and pardon-brokers, nor shall he be permitted with impunity to address in vulgar, scurrilous language a drunken, howling mob from the steps of the Executive Mansion.

Sir, unless this committee take charge of this matter and proceed with it, this Congress might as well lay down its powers. If, however, nothing more should be done, I am sure that, when the evidence which has been already taken is published, it will operate as a deliberate and solemn protest against a repetition in the future of another drunken electioneering tour such as last year mantled the cheek of this nation with shame; that it will be a protest against the unpardonable attacks which the acting Executive made upon the national Congress, a protest against his usurpations and crimes and misdemeanors.

Sir, his crime is not, as many suppose, the mere perfidy of which he has been guilty to the men who in an evil hour elected him Vice President of the United States, black and infamous as it is; his crime is the highest known in our country, a crime against the Republic itself.

If the investigation go no further, it will establish beyond question that the people of this country will not permit any man with impunity to be guilty of acts of which he has been guilty; and if so, the investigation will not have been in vain. Mr. Speaker, the United States is not the only nation which has been disgraced by such an executive head. Fortunately, however, for mankind such men are born into the world to curse the human race but once in centuries. The nation cries out in its agony and calls upon the Congress of the United States to deliver them from the shame and disgrace which the acting President has brought upon them. They demand that the loathing incubus which has blotted our country's history with its foulest blot shall be removed. In the name of loyalty betrayed, of law violated, of the Constitution trampled upon, the nation demands the impeachment and removal of Andrew Johnson.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio knows there is a large license allowed in debate in regard to impeachment, but the Chair is of opinion the gentleman is proceeding beyond that.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any insane asylum near here? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to go on in his own way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must abstain from language which will be regarded as personally offensive. He has the right under the Constitution to charge crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to call his attention to a matter somewhat personal to himself.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Not now. Well, Mr. President, I know how tender these men are who are in sympathy with the President—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call the gentleman to order; he is addressing the President of the United States. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must address the Chair.

Mr. BOYER. He is doing the President good service. We enjoy it very much on this side, and I hope he will not be interrupted.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. What does the gentleman say?

The SPEAKER. That the gentleman shall be allowed to proceed in his own way.

Mr. BOYER. On account of the service he is doing to the President of the United States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am glad the gentleman so regards it. Well, Mr. President— [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman has the President "on the brain." [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I know, on this question, that the timid among the loyal hesitate, that the late rebels and their northern allies are defiant, and that the camp-followers of the President alternately threaten and supplicate, and that all unite in prophesying war and revolution, and in any event financial ruin to the country, if Congress shall undertake to arraign and depose the President as provided by the Constitution. Sir, I hope this Congress will not hesitate to do its duty because the timid in our own ranks hesitate or because of the threats of the President's satraps and rebel allies, but that it will proceed with dignity and deliberation to the discharge of the high and important duty imposed upon it, uninfluenced by passion and unawed by fear. If, as has been happily suggested by one of our able and true men, the nation could stand the shock occasioned by the assassination of a beloved President by the hand of an assassin, it surely can stand the shock caused by the removal of one so detested as the acting President, if done in pursuance of law.

And, sir, has he not done enough? Before he had been one month in the Presidency he entered into a combination with the enemies of the nation to usurp in their interest the prerogatives of Congress, and sought to bind hand and foot the loyal men of the South, who had aided us in putting down the rebellion, by putting the governments of the South in the hands of their mortal enemies and ours. This with me is enough. When you add to this his other acts, which have become public history, the case for me is complete.

The duty of the President of the United States is to execute, not to make laws. His oath requires him to see that the laws are faithfully executed. That the President has neglected or refused to execute many of the laws of Congress no man questions. That he has failed to execute the civil rights bill, nay, that he has not even attempted to execute it the whole country knows. On the other hand, he has not only failed to execute it, but in most indecent and offensive language he has assailed and denounced the law as unconstitutional.

Sir, in his failure to execute this just and most necessary law the crime of the President becomes perfectly colossal. Since the surrender of Lee and Johnston more than five thousand American citizens, guilty of no crime but love of country, have been murdered by men who were lately in arms against this country. Thousands more have been driven from their homes into exile, while no effort has been made on the part of the executive department of the Government to give them the protection which the law demands and which humanity and justice demand. So far as I know, in no single instance has one murderer or rioter been arrested and punished for his crimes, while loyal men who served in the Union Army are arrested and tried before rebel tribunals and punished with unusual and severe punishments for doing acts when in the performance of military duty and obeying the orders of their superior officers, and no effort is made by the executive department of the Government to protect them. Sir, there never was a nation on this earth guilty of the infamy of treating its loyal citizens as the President of the United States has treated the loyal men of the South.

I know how easy it is for the President and his co-conspirators to deny his guilty knowledge. I know also how difficult it is to prove by technical rules the guilt of a man occupying his position, although the whole country may know him to be guilty.

Why, sir, when the rebellion broke out in the winter and spring of 1861, and for several months afterward, no man could have been arrested, tried, and convicted before a court and jury in this District who was engaged in conspiracy against this Government, although no sane man ever doubted their guilt. It is much more difficult in a case of this kind, where the rebellion is not an open, armed rebellion, but a negative rebellion. In this rebellion the President is the recognized leader, and it is well known that he has coöperating with him nearly all the late rebels of the South.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman for a definition of the expression "negative rebellion" which he has used several times in debate. It appears to be an expression of serious import; and if the gentleman cannot answer it, I do not know that anybody can.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I decline to yield. I know how difficult it is by technical rules to prove the guilty knowledge of men who refuse to execute the law while professing to do so. It is well known that the civil rights bill has not only not been enforced, but the vast military power at the disposal of the President, instead of being used to protect loyal men, has been used either by his guilty knowledge or by his indifference to crush the loyal men of the South.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman. I understood him to make a remark censuring the President because certain parties were not brought to trial. I wish to ask him if he thinks the President is to blame because Jefferson Davis has not been brought to trial?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am unable to answer that question. I know that in those military departments under his command where he does interfere he has used the military power to crush the loyal men instead of protecting them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman give us one single instance where the President has neglected his duty in regard to the trial of any person?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir; in New Orleans, in Memphis, and in every rebel State.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Could the President institute courts and try these parties?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not claim that he can, but he could give loyal men at least the same protection he has given rebels. He never hesitates to interfere in favor of rebels. I refer the gentleman to the case of Mr. Watson, of Virginia, and others; but it is not necessary that I should go into this.

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say that, in view of all the facts before us, if this investigation is not proceeded with, and this man is not put on trial, the provision of the Constitution providing for the impeachment of the President is valueless. Sir, if this man is not impeached, if he is not tried and deposed from the high place which he has disgraced, then no man who may succeed him need ever fear trial and conviction, no matter what his crime.

Sir, if this Congress will but do its duty and meet the just expectations of the loyal people of this country by empowering its Judiciary Committee to proceed with this investigation, and the committee do so with that energy which attends the proceedings in an ordinary criminal case, I believe the impeachment and conviction of the President is as inevitable as death.

Mr. Speaker, I should not have trespassed so long upon the time of the House as I have done but for interruptions. But I desire to make one suggestion which has just occurred to me. It is this: that all persons, whether citizens or foreigners, who have any documents in their possession which would be evidence in this case, or who are in the possession of any facts tending to show technically the guilt of this man, ought as a matter of duty to bring them to the knowledge of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Any person in the possession of such facts or documents refusing or neglecting to do so becomes an accessory in the crime of this man, and will be held responsible before the country and in the great tribunal of human history as a copartner in his guilt.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I object to the gentleman's yielding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read the rule upon this subject.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"While a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another for explanation of the pending measure as well as for personal explanation."

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is for the purpose of personal explanation I certainly do not object.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I do not boast of possessing any extraordinary degree of courage, either moral or physical, but I thank my Creator that He has so constituted me that I can rise upon the floor of this House and declare my convictions, even though they differ from those of the majority of the party with whom I act.

Sir, I differ toto cælo from my colleague from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] who has just taken his seat; and standing here in the very place from which, less than two months ago, he charged the Executive of the nation with high crimes and misdemeanors, I denounce the whole scheme of impeachment as one of consummate folly. I say, sir, that no one act amounting to a crime or a misdemeanor has as yet been proved against the Executive of this nation, and I challenge any one to reply to me when I make that averment.

And I say more than that. It is not expected by some of those who charge the Executive with high crimes and misdemeanors that proof will be obtained. It is only necessary, as has been said in high places within the last week or ten days, that it should be known that the President is an "obstruction" in the way of what my friend from Ohio calls "progress," and the Radical party of the country will feel it to be their duty to remove him from office.

Sir, I hold to no such doctrine, and I say to my associates of the great Union party that they are mistaken if they suppose that the intelligent people of the United States are going to uphold them in a practice based upon any such principle.

I had the utmost confidence in the Judiciary Committee as constituted in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I doubt not I shall repose an equal degree of confidence in any committee that shall be constituted by our present Speaker. I have no objections to this investigation being pursued through the channel of the Judiciary Committee; I know in fact that it will take that course. But at the same time, in order to be consistent, I must say that I do oppose it and shall oppose it, until I have some satisfactory evidence presented to my mind to show that we can make an appeal to the conscience of this great nation when we seek to deprive it of its executive head.

Sir, we are bringing our republican institutions, our popular form of government, to a test such as no free nation ever yet imposed upon its Government with impunity. I trust we are not yet called to exhibit the same temper with those who lived in the days of Oliver Cromwell in England, or with Robespierre and Marat in France, when men who one day advocated the most extreme measures of the Radicals were the next day brought to the block or the guillotine because they were not far enough in the advance in the line of progress. Is that to be our condition in this country?

Mr. ROSS, (in his seat.) That is the road we are traveling.

Mr. SPALDING. I have in my place voted for every radical measure of reconstruction proposed in this House, and yet we have not adopted measures radical enough to suit the purposes of some gentlemen who are around me. They now cry for the head of the Executive.

Mr. WOOD, (in his seat.) They want more blood.

Mr. SPALDING. And for what good purpose? Is it to make way for some other man or set of men? Is this whole nation to be convulsed; is our public credit to be trifled with; are our stocks to be brought down to forty, thirty, twenty, or perhaps ten cents on the dollar, just to gratify this eagerness to remove the executive head of the nation? I can, in conscience, support no such policy.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-one minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I propose to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. The matter now under consideration is one of very serious character. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is in the possession of facts which will authorize the step he proposes to take, then he is justified in bringing it before the House. But there is a charge going the rounds of the press of the country tending to show that the gentleman from Ohio is not the proper person to initiate the movement in this matter; and as a reason for that charge against the gentleman from Ohio certain letters are published which purport to have been written some years ago by the gentleman, then a member of Congress, to a gentleman by the name of Case. The letters are of rather queer import, and I desire to ask that they be read, and that the gentleman from Ohio have an opportunity to explain them. I have no desire to do this out of any feeling of unkindness toward the gentleman; but I think he should have an opportunity to explain them.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not yield to have the gentleman come in here with any such impertinence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] that while he has the right to say of the remarks of any member that they are not pertinent, he is not in order when he says a gentleman is impertinent.

Mr. CHANLER. I demand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] shall take his seat until the House grant him permission to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] did not himself call the gentleman from Ohio to order.

Mr. CHANLER. He was called to order by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There are two classes of objections: one class is where the Speaker rules that a member must confine himself to the subject under consideration; the other is where some gentleman rises in his place and says, or the Speaker reminds the member speaking, that in his remarks he is violating the rules of order. In the present case, no gentleman rising to make the point of order, the Chair intimated to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] that there was a nice line of distinction between the word "pertinent" and the word "impertinent." The Chair does not think it is one of those cases where a member can demand that the other shall take his seat.

Mr. CHANLER. I beg leave to state that on a similar occasion in the last Congress, when one of the members on the other side of the House was called to order for improper language, called to order by the Chair, he was permitted to proceed because, as the Chair stated, no member arose in his place and objected to his proceeding. On this occasion I rose immediately and objected to the gentleman proceeding, and the Chair rules that objection out of order. I hope the Chair will explain so that I may understand the logic of his ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will explain to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] with very great pleasure. The language used by a gentleman in the last Congress, now alluded to, as the Chair understands, by the gentleman from New York, was language directly and personally insulting to a member of the House, apparently so intended. The Chair ruled that that language was out of order. No member followed up the ruling of the Chair by insisting that the gentleman who had used such language should take his seat until permitted by a vote of the House to proceed; and afterward, when the point was raised, the Chair ruled that it was made too late. In this case the Chair intimated to the gentleman from Ohio that his remark, in the language in which he put it, was not strictly within the bounds of parliamentary decorum. The gentleman probably intended to use language which was parliamentary. Neither the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] to whom the remark was addressed, nor any other gentleman raised any point; and hence it may be presumed the remark was not regarded as personally offensive.

Mr. NIBLACK. I never make points of order on personal matters. I do not settle my personal grievances in that way.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair must decline further argument on the point. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor, and must proceed, unless the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] or some other gentleman, appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CHANLER. I certainly do not take any appeal; but I desire to renew my request to the gentleman from Ohio, without meaning any impertinence to him, that he will give us his definition of a "negative rebellion." I hope he will not leave the House and the country in ignorance on that point. The term is one which, so far as I know, has been invented by the gentleman himself; and I trust he will give the country and the world a definition of it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I must decline to allow myself to be further interrupted by the gentleman from New York. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] that perhaps I ought not to have used the language which I did, but I say that the gentleman's suggestion is not pertinent to the question before the House.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does the gentleman withdraw the expression that he used?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Certainly. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that the point which he raises has no possible connection with this question, and is not at all pertinent to it. When those letters were originally published, some five or six years ago, I came into this House and asked for an investigation. A committee was appointed, Mr. Speaker, by your predecessor, two of the committee being Democrats and three Republicans. I never went before that committee except when they sent for me to give my evidence, which I think was altogether unnecessary. The committee, after examining the whole matter, unani- mously exonerated me from doing or intending to do an improper act. I undertake to say further, Mr. Speaker, that if the private letters of any gentleman in this House were purloined and published they might often on their face appear very difficult of explanation. But, sir, as they have nothing to do with this question I declined to yield to permit the gentleman to spread those letters upon the records.

Mr. NIBLACK. I simply desired to say to the gentleman that the papers throughout the country are using these letters in connection with this matter of impeachment. I had never heard of the vindication to which the gentleman refers, and I desired to bring the matter to the gentleman's attention, so that he might state publicly whether the letters are genuine, and so that he might present his vindication, if he had any to present.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not require any vindication. The gentleman understands very well that since this matter has been introduced here I have been assailed—and among others by papers in his own district—in the most offensive manner; assailed as he knows, falsely. I do not propose to reply to any of those assaults upon me. The constituency whom for ten years I have represented on this floor will take care of me and my character; and I do not ask the gentleman from Indiana, nor any member on this floor, to take care of it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask the gentleman whether I did not take some pains to have a correction made in a paper in my district.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The gentleman did so.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am not assailing the gentleman's character.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. How long?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Eight minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I assume that the action of the Thirty-Ninth Congress upon the report of their committee, that there is reasonable cause for the investigation of the grave charges made against the President of the United States by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] forecloses the question on the main issue. I hold this Congress would be false to itself, false to the country, false to the principles of the American Government did they shrink from the investigation.

I would not have troubled the House with a single observation but for the new points which have been thrown into the case by the condition of public affairs. One was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] when this House was organizing, that this was not a constitutional body for the purpose of legitimate business because a portion of the States that had not destroyed themselves was not represented. Sir, I wish to answer that the First Congress of the United States, which counted the votes and declared George Washington President of the United States, assembled with only a quorum of each body; there being at that time but eleven States in the Union, and only a bare majority of the members, both in the House and Senate, was present. Both Houses adjourned from day to day until a majority appeared, and the moment they thus obtained a quorum, that moment they proceeded to the great business of organizing this Government by making George Washington President and going into general legislation. Therefore we stand by the fathers, for if a bare quorum of the Representatives elected to the First Congress of the United States, and only a majority of the States composing the Union, could make George Washington President, cannot this House unmake Andrew Johnson? [Laughter.]

Sir, this proceeding is likened to an inquest; a grand jury consists of twenty-three men, in which thirteen men only need be present, and a bill is properly found if twelve vote for it; and I assume if the report of the learned Committee on the Judiciary of the last House is to be trusted—and who doubts it?—whenever this House does act on a final report declaring an impeachment there will be an absolute majority of the whole House in favor of such impeachment of Andrew Johnson for high crimes and misdemeanors.

Another point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is the misconception I have of the report of the committee of the last House as it is popularly understood. That committee reported there were grave charges and evidence to sustain them, yet we have been tauntingly asked why did it take two months to find that out, and why did not the committee report charges if the facts are as well known as they are claimed to be by the friends of the measure? The propriety of withholding any report of the facts in the manner they did, whether the matter has to be further investigated, or whether it was not to be further investigated, no man will question. I think we may assume they were referring to evidence which the public knows not of. They were referring to subjects which require investigation; careful, discreet, cool, and I may say in view of public affairs, but decent in view of the great consequences which may ensue from their investigations. Therefore they did not desire to make two reports, although they might have reported upon the grave charges which all men know, usurpation of executive and legislative power, misuse of the pardoning and appointing power, the return of immense amounts of material which belonged to rebel communities to the men composing these communities, without authority of law.

Those are open and known to all men; ay, even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] must have heard of them, however much he may have slept through the events of the last year. Upon these, in my judgment, sufficient articles might be found, and they are the great charges upon which the House will be called to vote.

We are called upon to find evidence upon this question. The custom of Parliaments has ever been to find evidence upon such questions, and to find impeachment upon well-grounded common fame, common report of the misconduct of any high officer whenever any committee of the popular branch of the Legislature can be found to entertain that common fame and common report. So that current history, which is the evidences upon which all governmental action is based, is the evidence upon which impeachment may be based so far as the facts are concerned, which appear upon the judicial, legislative, and executive records of the country.

But, as regards secret crimes, if any there be, I think it of very little consequence whether there are any or not, because I am willing to take the gauntlet thrown down by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] and I say that if any man stands in the way of the great march of this country to honor, glory, peace, unity, happiness, liberty, and law he must be taken out of the way by the constitutional, conservative, and radical method.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's eight minutes have expired.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. How long?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not want the floor until he is done.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I intend to call the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman intend to call it?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. And to sustain it after the charges he has made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has fifteen minutes.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will yield that time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BROOKS. Silence will be the most eloquent answer to the gentleman if he moves the previous question. I will not make any remarks under such a restriction as to time upon such a solemn charge.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman allow me five minutes?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, this question of impeachment is a very grave one, and we ought to undertake it with great deliberation. I think we ought not at this time to allege that any evidence that we have is sufficient to impeach the President. It is time enough to decide that question after the Committee on the Judiciary shall have given the subject a fair and impartial investigation. We ought to consider the matter coolly and deliberately, and ought not to prejudge the case. The Committee on the Judiciary are to be appointed by the honorable Speaker of this House. I am satisfied he will select men of legal ability, and gentlemen who will give the subject careful and thorough consideration. It is proper that the matter should first be considered by men of eminent legal ability and reported upon to the House. If the evidence is sufficient to put the President of the United States upon his trial, let him have a fair and impartial hearing. He should not be screened because he holds the highest office in the nation, but should be treated like any other citizen of this Government, however humble.

But, sir, I am opposed to prejudging this or any other case. I am not in favor of pronouncing upon this floor that he is guilty before we have an investigation and the evidence laid before the House. If when the committee in charge have given the subject a fair and full investigation they shall find that he has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, I for one would be ready to say, impeach him, and remove him from the presidential chair with as little delay as practicable, and not prolong the trial in imitation to the great Hastings case before Parliament. But until that committee shall report, it is improper for us to pass on his guilt or innocence.

I admit that the great Republican party which promoted Andrew Johnson to his present high position have been badly treated. We elected him to that position, and he has turned his back against us and has joined hand in hand with those who opposed the war to put down the rebellion; and this in a great measure, I have the charity to believe, was owing to bad advisers, of which any man will get plenty when he deserts his friends and partakes of the forbidden fruit. But with all that we, as the Representatives of the people, must try him as we would try any other man. Give him an impartial trial; wait for the evidence and report of your committee, and then, if evidence sustains the charges as to his guilt, do not hesitate to impeach him; and, on the other hand, if insufficient, dismiss the subject, and let the country understand that he escapes for want of proper evidence. But, I repeat, until the committee shall report let us forbear making any allegations as to his guilt or innocence.

But as the people of the country seem to demand investigation it is the duty of this Congress to proceed with as little delay as possible, and let there be no shrinking from duty, investigate it thoroughly, and if necessary probe it to the core.

Now, sir, it has been said that our action here upon this question may affect the financial condition of the country. We are told that if we impeach the President our Government securities will depreciate in the market, and that it will bring upon us bankruptcy. I have no such fears, and Congress ought not to be intimidated by any suggestions of the kind. But even if it would have that effect, it is no reason for shrinking from duty. Let us go on and investigate this matter fairly, and if the evidence bears out the charges made against the President, or such of them as in our opinion justify his removal from office, let us prefer articles of impeachment and put him upon his trial, and if, on the contrary, after a full investigation by the Judiciary Committee the evidence is found insufficient, then, as I have already said, dismiss the subject, and bear with him as well as we can until the expiration of his term, when we can select a man that will not turn against those that place him in power. There is no denying, Mr. Speaker, that it is galling to have a man promoted to a high position turn his back against those to whom he is indebted for elevation, and use the mighty patronage he wields against them. Such a course will be condemned by the civilized world, but still that alone is not sufficient to sustain an impeachment.

Had Andrew Johnson been true to his friends he had an opportunity of making himself popular, and been an honor to himself and his country. After the assassination of the much-lamented Lincoln, the mantle of that great and good man, at whose death the nation still mourns, was thrown on the shoulders of Mr. Johnson; but, alas! in an evil hour he was induced to partake of the forbidden fruit in the form of modern democracy, which seemed pleasant for him to look upon, hence his great fall. His course will be a warning to all those in future that may occupy the presidential chair not to forsake the party that elected him. And now, Mr. Speaker, as the time allotted to me has expired, permit me to say in conclusion that I for one will shrink from no duty; that I am willing to enter upon this great absorbing question without fear or favor, with a determination of deciding the case, so far as this House is concerned, according to the evidence, and I feel assured that is the determination of the other Union members.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the resolutions upon the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 119, not voting 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Denison, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Kerr, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Van Auken, and Wood—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Corvode, Cullom, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingerson, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Newcomb, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsey, Pomeroy, Price, Raun, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Seoheld, Shanks, Shullabarger, Smith, Stevens, Taffa, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—119.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Glossbrenner, Griswold, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kelsey, Pike, Selye, Spaulding, Van Trump, and Henry D. Washburn—9.

So the House refused to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. At the request of gentlemen upon this side of the House and upon the other side, I desire to submit a proposition. It is that the previous question be now sustained, and then I will yield fifty minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] with the understanding that at the end of that time the vote shall be taken without further delay.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object. It is most unusual for the reference of resolutions to be thus debated, and I think it is entirely unnecessary in this case.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio could only be carried out by unanimous consent.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move a suspension of the rules, so that the main question shall be ordered on this motion, and fifty minutes allowed to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to debate it.

The question was put; and (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the motion of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand, then, that fifty minutes are allowed to this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The fifty minutes are at the disposal of the gentleman, and he can transfer any portion of his time to whomsoever he pleases.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, when I heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] indulging in those adjectives and epithets and nouns of uncommon magnitude with which he denounced the President of the United States, it seemed to me to recall the revolutionary scenes of French history, when Marat and Danton and Robespierre, on an occasion somewhat similar to this, were in the French convention. In an American Congress I think I never heard before such phrases used applied to the executive branch of the Government. I was not, therefore, surprised when the Speaker called the gentleman to order, or suggested to him that indulgence in such phrases was not only not in order, but unbecoming to a parliamentary body.

A body of conspirators, and the President the chief of those conspirators! That was beautiful declamation; but it was only declamation, for there is no proof whatsoever of such a conspiracy, or that the President of the United States was the chief of those conspirators.

And to go further, he denounced the President as being in complicity with the assassins of President Lincoln. Now, it is not within my power as a Representative upon the floor of this House to properly characterize expressions of that sort when applied to the executive branch of the Government. It is in substance saying, or making an effort to say, that the President of the United States was an accomplice in or connected with the assassination of President Lincoln. What proof is there to support that charge except the mere declaration of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY?] And in the same phrase he denounced the White House as the home of thieves and the den of pardon-brokers; and he went on to denounce the President as a great criminal, guilty of high crimes.

Sir, hitherto such language has never been applied in any parliamentary body in this country to the President of the United States. And the gentleman proceeds to speak of the mental and moral caliber of the President as being deficient for the situation to which he has been elevated by the action of the party represented by those on the other side of the House, and not by any action of ours. Sir, it is sufficient to look at the recent production, which he [Mr. ASHLEY] denounced upon the floor of this House, in his veto message, and compare the mental and moral caliber of that production with any state paper or document ever brought before the people of this country.

The gentleman from Ohio speaks of those connected with the President and disposed to defend the policy of his administration as rebel allies, satraps, &c. All this is mere words, wind, without weight, and unbecoming any parliamentary body in this country. Now, if there were anything in the charges of the gentleman, if the President were thus guilty of conspiracy and were the chief of the conspirators, if his house be the den of thieves and the home of pardon-brokers, then why this delay? I ask the gentleman from Ohio why go through the delay of an investigating committee? Why not institute upon the floor of this House an immediate procedure for an impeachment? For what purpose were we here assembled in this extraordinary session, with abundant leisure before us, but to go on with something or other like an impeachment? If the President is guilty of these high crimes and misdemeanors, why the proposed adjournment for two or three months, abandoning the Government to the chief of conspirators, to a house of pardon-brokers and den of thieves? Sir, if there is one word of truth in what has been said by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] this House ought this very day, this very hour, to institute the process of impeachment, and not adjourn till it has been disposed of. We are here, and should not shrink from our duty. If the President of the United States has been guilty of these things charged against him, now is the day and the hour for his impeachment; this very hour, without the least delay.

I fancy, however, that the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is but indulging in all this declamation and these insinuations for the purpose of prejudicing and preparing the public mind for the revolution which he has in contemplation. I do not imagine that he expects to sustain any of these broad charges before the people through the investigation of the Judiciary Committee. I imagine his effort is to try to dupe the public to prejudice the case, and by the use of strong words, by nouns more uncommon than common, by adjectives long and short, so to prepare the public mind that the President of the United States can be deposed or impeached without any investigation whatever.

Equally trite was the other imaginative phrase of the honorable gentleman from Ohio when he spoke of the five thousand Union men who had been killed in the southern States since the close of the war.

I am an attentive reader of the newspapers, and a keen observer of what is going on in the southern country, and I pronounce that whole declaration to be a mere figment or fiction of the honorable gentleman's brain. There is hardly a word of truth in it. There is no more crime in the southern country in proportion to the population than there is in the city which I in part represent; and throughout the whole South there has been committed no crime so infamously atrocious as that recently committed in the State of Minnesota. I venture to declare here, and I think I can sustain the declaration by statistics, that during the year and a half last past there has been no more crime committed in the ten southern States than has been committed in ten northern States of like population. Crime exists everywhere in every form—burglaries, arsons, assassinations—not alone in the South, but throughout all parts of the country. Yet every crime of less or greater enormity occurring, or alleged to have occurred, throughout the southern country, has been garnered up here and spread before the people to inflame the popular mind and induce the people to sanction the passage of the military bill and the impeachment of the President of the United States.

"Five thousand killed!" I again declare there is no proof of it upon the record. On the contrary, it is on record before one of the committees of this House that with regard to the remote State of Texas, where it is alleged three hundred Union men have been murdered, the opinion of General Sheridan, in command there, is that martial-law is unnecessary, and that the civil law can be maintained and properly executed.

Mr. Speaker, I pass with pleasure from this mere declamation of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to the specifications of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who, with more care and more minuteness, recites some of the high crimes and misdemeanors of which the President is alleged to have been guilty. But before I proceed to comment upon those specifications, let me tell the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who stands here in the way temporarily of this impeachment, that in this revolution the character which he is personating—with perfect sincerity I doubt not—is that of a Girondist attempting to oppose the Jacobins in their mad determination to push on further and still further in their revolution. In all probability the history of the Jacobins is to be rewritten and reacted here in these United States. The gentleman from Ohio, an early upholder and defender of the Radical party, a man who almost from his youth has sustained its principles, and when they were very unpopular, is now attempting to resist this great current of revolution. I do not shut my eyes to facts; I endeavor to comprehend them truly, however much I dislike them; and looking at the facts as they present themselves, I say that I do not think this revolution is yet to stop. I do not think its history is yet half written, yet half acted out. Unless the record of all like revolutions is a lie, unless the stories of Augustus and Julius Cæsar, of Cromwell, of Napoleon are fictions, the revolution which has been begun in this country is to go on. The President of the United States, though his head may not be brought to the block, is to be by force deposed and driven from the White House. Such is the history of revolutions. The Girondists of the era of the French Revolution were obliged to succumb; and the Conservatives of this day will be temporarily overcome by the Jacobins of our time, who will run riot in their revolutionary projects until some future Napoleon, not yet budded and blown, shall assume military command in this country, and out of chaos bring back order, and be the means of arousing the people to the defense of their liberties and of the Constitution of the United States.

Hence, while I admire the resistance of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, and the partial resistance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] to the present revolutionary programme, I see that all such efforts must be unavailing. History tells me that the destructive work of the revolutionists—the architects of ruin—must go on. And I appreciate also the fact that I and those who are politically associated with me must be prepared to endure our share of the disastrous future now opening on the country. I apprehend that we on this side of the House will soon be no safer in the enjoyment of our rights here than if we were to day subject to the despotic rule which has already spread itself over the sacred precincts of Mount Vernon, where repose the remains of Washington—no longer the soil of liberty; no longer the dwelling-place of freedom and of freemen; no longer the pilgrimage for the free and the brave, but in the land of the despot, who exercises there the tyrannical sway of the Turk, the Tartar, the Asiatic—in a region of country where some mere brigadier, without reason or the pretense of reason, can recklessly incarcerate any American citizen and doom him to imprisonment, without remedy or redress. Alas, sir, no American citizen can now boast on the sacred soil of Mount Vernon, when bending or weeping over the remains of the great Father of this once Republic, that he is in the land of the free; for despotism, the vilest of despotisms, a lawless military despotism, has seized upon and trampled upon the consecrated Mount, as Turk upon Marathon, as Arab over the hills and plains of the Jordan. All, all, is despotism from the Potomac to the Rio Grande.

One half, ay more than one half, of the original territory of the Republic is no longer a Republic; no longer the home for a freeman; no longer the proper dwelling-place of an American citizen; no more a place to emigrate to than Egypt or Algeria; where there is now no more liberty than in Turkey or Tartary. The despotism which has been carried into the southern country, as I have before remarked, is in the progress of revolution to be extended over the northern people before it is finished. In the midst of this revolution we hear the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] calmly expostulating, too late, sir, I fear too late. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] and his associates must triumph over them in the end, for they are the extremes, the Dantons of this revolution, the arbiters of the land, and their subjects here and elsewhere must obey. Whence once the Girond trusted himself to the stormy sea of revolution, the rudder was lost, and he drifts where the Jacobin commands.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in the enumeration of his articles of impeachment, goes on in the spirit of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] and says that this House will be false if it shrinks from the impeachment now. Perhaps he is right; having gone as far as they have, they must go on with the revolution. The ball which has been set in motion is not to be stopped; it is irresistible, and will go on until it rolls all over this House, and the country, too. But I respect the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] for the frankness with which he has addressed the House.

Before, however, I proceed to enumerate his specifications of impeachment, let me say, in reply to a remark which he made concerning a few observations submitted by me at the organization of the House, that the first House of Congress proceeded to its organization without all the States being represented, and that when the President of the United States, George Washington, was declared elected, there was not a full House present. In reply to all that, sir, let me refer him to the record I have before me in the Journal of the First Congress. There were but eleven States in the Union then. Rhode Island, one of the original thirteen, was not then a State in the Union. She refused to come in. North Carolina was not a State in the Union. There were only eleven States of the Union then, but ten of them were upon the floor of the House when George Washington was declared to be the President of the United States. Congress adjourned from day to day for a full month, until States enough were present to justify organization. I said the other day there were seventeen States absent now; I should have had added Oregon. There were, sir, eighteen States absent when we proceeded to organize this House; eighteen States out, leaving nineteen to conduct the business of the country in the absence of eighteen.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. By how many Senators and Representatives were those ten States represented? Ten Senators and twenty-eight Representatives out of twenty-two Senators and sixty Representatives.

Mr. BROOKS. Several were absent from the floor of this House at the first day of the session from the nineteen States present. I did not enumerate the members; I counted the States. The record shows that in the First Congress there were ten States represented out of the eleven.

We are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts that the President is to be impeached for executive and legislative usurpation. Well, this is a late day to proceed to impeach for what has been done over a year and a half ago! Why was it not thought of before? Why this long sleepiness over so great a crime? How happens it that the Thirty-Ninth Congress slumbered, slept over this awful enormity, and that the gentleman fresh from Massachusetts has just found it out? Where were the guardians of the Republic before the arrival of the honorable gentleman here? But if there has been a great crime it can be resisted now by the judiciary alone, without involving the two Houses of Congress in the tedious process of impeachment. There are courts of law. The instruments of these usurpations can all be arrested, estopped, and condemned before the recognized tribunals of the land. Sir, all this is an after-thought, a year and a half behind the time, and the discovery of it now is too late even to take out the patent-right therefor. Hence I do not attach any importance to that specification, and I do not think more can be made out of it than the more wordy, windy charge of the gentleman from Ohio.

The gentleman from Massachusetts next goes a little further and specifies one other enumeration, namely, that the President of the United States has surrendered war materials to the rebels. I suppose he refers to the surrender of railroads and other materials after the war; and therefore he says the President ought to be impeached. I am quite sure the records of the Department will show that whatever surrender of such material the President has made has been made upon consultation with his Cabinet, and by the advice and sanction of the Secretary of War and of the Lieutenant General of the Army of the United States. But I put it to the gentleman from Massachusetts, if that is a fair matter for impeachment? I ask him if the fact of the surrender by the President in the conflict of the war or at its close of war materials, for the public advantage or good, is any matter for impeachment at all, or even for denunciation; and I am quite sure I shall have the response of "no." If I have read aright the history of the war, for every dollar of material surrendered by the President to the rebels the gentleman from Massachusetts, as a commander in the field, has surrendered to those rebels ten dollars' worth of material where the President has surrendered one.

General Grant himself, on the Appomattox, when the conflict of war was over, surrendered to the mounted rebels all their horses, and General Lee himself rode off on a horse the gift or grant of the victor. If, then, the surrender of war material is an impeachable crime, when General Grant is deposed, when the Cabinet all are impeached, when the President himself is deprived forever of all office for life therefor, we shall then be looking after the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts to indict or to impeach him for the surrender of war material to the rebels in the proportion of ten where the President has surrendered one.

I admire, however, the frankness of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He speaks plain Anglo-Saxon English, and I admire this directness and frankness of speech as I do the freedom of speech which we so often find in the old State of Massachusetts, where there is no disguise in words, ideas, or intents in revolutionary times. The President, he tells us, is in the way of the glorious march of progress; is in the way of ideas and of legislation.

The gentleman's words, as I have them, were that "He who stands in the way of progress must be taken out of the way." This is freedom and frankness of expression; this is speaking out loud what is spoken from the inner circles of the caucus. The President of the United States is in the way and must be removed. This is revolutionary talk in Cromwellian English, and I like it. No matter what says the Constitution of the United States; no matter what may be the once necessary form of election; no matter what may be the precedents of British or American law; no matter whether those precedents are right or wrong, the Executive stands in the way of our party and he must be removed and stricken down. This is the whole secret of this process of impeachment, and here on this floor it is candidly avowed. I like it. I like to hear it. The truth is sometimes pleasant, however harsh.

Let me appeal to my Republican friends on the other side to consider what a precedent this is that they are called upon to establish as law. At some future time they will be in the minority; another party will be in the majority; and if the President of the minority stands in the way of the party of the majority that majority can suspend, impeach, and if he stands in their way remove him. If such a precedent, therefore, is established, this is no longer a constitutional Government. We are no longer a people living under a Constitution if such principles can be carried out. Let it go to the country, then, here from this Hall, that the chief leader of impeachment here has avowed, in substance, that no matter as to "the crimes or misdemeanors" of the President, whether he be guilty or not, so long as he stands in their way that is enough—he must be taken off and stricken down.

And now, Mr. Speaker, without going into political details, let me ask what are to be the consequences if we execute the revolutionary decrees of the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts and Ohio. I am not going to portray what effect such an abrogation of all constitutional law is likely to have upon the morals or the politics of the country. All of us know that the Government is founded, not only upon the people, but upon constitutional forms and obligations, and if you once cut loose from all these obligations, with all the accumulation of debt which you have on hand, what are to be the consequences only upon the debt, the property, and the finances of the country? I hesitate not to say that I know, as the Representative of a very large commercial district, and as the Representative through that commercial district more or less of the commerce and trade of the country, that the first movement of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] has already cost the merchants, capitalists, manufacturers, and farmers of this country over a hundred million dollars. Already by his action and his course over a hundred million dollars have been sacrificed in the stocks, obligations, and property of this country. And now he proposes to keep up this agitation for months and months longer. Sir, if the bears of Wall street, who have profited by the calamities which have recently occurred there to the amount of millions, if those men, laden down by the profits of the gambling operations which have damaged the bonds of the States of Missouri, Iowa, Illinois, and other northwestern States, were to give him $1,000,000 for the mischief he has already created, they would but feebly discharge their high obligations to him for the enormous sums of money they have gained in consequence of his action.

And yet it is now proposed that for two or three or perhaps six months longer this alarming agitation shall be continued. What is the proposition presented to us in the resolution before the House, and which we are called upon to adopt? It is to provide the Committee on the Judiciary with an unlimited amount of money and means to enable them to go about the country hunting up scandals, drumming up witnesses, employing detectives, informers, spies, and the like to suborn perjury, informers of all classes and kinds, in order to recreate this agitation and reëxcite the people. Sir, we have already approached, if we are not in the midst of a financial crisis. The wages of labor are already being cut down in the State of Rhode Island; hundreds of operatives are being discharged from the factories of Massachusetts and Connecticut; thousands of laborers are stalking unemployed through the streets of New York; and elsewhere throughout the country the demand for labor is made by thousands who are dependent upon it for their daily subsistence.

Like operations will extend from the great heart of New York through all the country if this agitation is encouraged to go on. No more railroads can be built in the West, no more bonds of western States can be sold, no more capital can be profitably employed in those States.

It is proper, therefore, I again repeat, that this impeachment should go on this very day, or it should stop this very day. Agitation, revolutionary agitation, financial agitation, is death to the commerce, the trade, the agriculture, the capital of this country. If the President of the United States is to be removed or deposed, take him now from the White House, and install there your newly-elected President of the Senate. Do it forthwith, immediately; and then go on with no longer delay in this work of destruction and death. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

The SPEAKER. How long a time does the gentleman propose to yield to his colleague, [Mr. WOOD?]

Mr. BROOKS. What time does he want?

Mr. WOOD. Not many minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to him for such time as he may want. When he has concluded, if I have time left I will yield it to others.

Mr. WOOD. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, upon the mere question of reference to discuss the subject of impeachment. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the President of the United States, I suggest that upon a preliminary question of this kind such a discussion would be not only out of place, but calculated to do irreparable injury to the great subject involved.

Therefore, in the few remarks that I propose to submit to the House, I shall not follow the example of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] who introduced these resolutions. I certainly shall not follow his example of vituperation and wholesale slanders, already refuted by the report made to the Thirty-Ninth Congress by this same Committee on the Judiciary. That committee, composed of the ablest and most distinguished men of the last House, after sitting for two months, every day and almost every hour engaged in this investigation, made a lame and impotent conclusion in the report, which they submitted to that House, which refuted every allegation of slander the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] originally made upon this floor.

Therefore, at this time I shall not attempt to defend the President of the United States. When that committee shall have made its report, and when there is exhibited to the country and to the world an accusation of sufficient consequence to warrant the action of this House upon the question of impeachment, then I shall be prepared to discuss the subject, and to startle this House and the country with reference to the secret motives and acts of those who have instituted this proceeding.

But I have risen now for no such purpose. I have risen merely to express my regret that at the very threshold of this Fortieth Congress we shall distinguish our proceedings by reviving an agitation and an excitement which is calculated to do great injury to all the industrial pursuits of our land. I have risen to protest against the continued agitation of a question of this magnitude and importance. I ask this House to give this country rest; to allow the people of the United States to have a few months of quiet that they may look after their individual interests and pursuits. Instead of continuing an agitation of this character, let us do something toward relieving the people; let us recognize the duties that are imposed upon us as legislators, and attempt to develop the material resources of the country; let us do something to reduce the enormous public debt that now hangs over our land; to lessen this grievous burden of taxation which is now oppressing the people; to develop our mineral, our agricultural, our manufacturing resources. In short, I ask that the Congress of the United States may proceed with calmness, with statesmanship, with a cool, careful examination, to legislate for the real wants of the land, and not continue an excitement and an agitation of the public mind which is a terror to the capital of the country, which is preventing the industry of the country from expanding, and which is retarding the process of pacification in the land. I ask that we rise to a full appreciation of the duties and responsibilities imposed upon us by our constituencies.

I have, therefore, risen to protest against the revival of this question of impeachment at all. The report of the late Judiciary Committee is of itself a sufficient argument why the proposition should not now be renewed. What a spectacle have we had exhibited here to-day! An unprecedented course of action on the part of the mover of this resolution; upon a mere motion of reference he has discussed the whole question of impeachment. He has gone into an argument, if his declaration can be called an argument, to convict in advance the man whose conduct he proposes to have investigated. He has assumed to stand up here and pronounce judicially upon the question of impeachment, and that, too, in such a way as to convince the House and the country in advance that he is incapable of giving a disinterested and unprejudiced vote upon the subject.

Sir, in every deliberative body, whether in this country or in Europe, where an attempt has been made to impeach a high executive officer, mere self-respect, if nothing else, has prevented any member from exhibiting himself in advance in the attitude and position which the gentleman from Ohio has assumed here to-day.

But I will not discuss the merits involved in this question of impeachment. I have risen merely to make my protest and to express my regret at the proposed action; to implore the Congress of the United States to discharge its legislative duties, to do something to relieve the oppressed people of our land, something to encourage the industrial interest now suffering so long in consequence of this agitation. The war is over, but peace is not yet restored; one third of the country is still paralyzed for want of action on the part of the Government. The people are yearning to be allowed by the Congress of the United States to again make their bread by the sweat of their brows.

And yet we here, clothed with high official power, professing to represent this whole land, propose to put an impediment in their way, to adopt measures that must be destructive to their welfare.

Therefore, sir, I hope that we may hear no more of this question of impeachment. If the subject is to be referred, let it be referred; let the committee after full and fair examination make their report; and if that committee shall, upon sufficient evidence, report that the President of the United States has been guilty of any of the crimes with which he is charged, if the committee can sustain any of these grave accusations by testimony, I will go with the gentleman from Ohio and the other gentlemen on that side of the House in favor of the impeachment and removal of the President of the United States.

Mr. BROOKS. I now yield six minutes to my colleague, [Mr. PRUYN.]

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I differed from some of my associates, though I assented to their decision, as to the propriety of accepting the small allowance of fifty minutes in which to discuss on this side of the House an important question like that now presented to our consideration. In the brief period accorded to us we can do little more than enter our protest against the proceeding which is now about to be instituted by this House, and refer in a very hasty way to the reasons which impel us to oppose this measure.

In what position, sir, does this House now stand, and what does this proceeding mean? If this resolution be adopted, it is significant of something. Of what? We are here as a new Congress. We have just taken the oath of office. Without any investigation, without any examination, without any proof, with nothing upon which to base our action except loose declamation of such a character that the Presiding Officer of this House felt bound to interfere and check it, we, acting as the highest legislative body of the country, are about to declare virtually to the world that in our belief there are facts before this House sufficient to warrant proceedings looking to the impeachment of the President of the United States. This is not a meaningless proceeding; it is not a matter of form; but we are bound in honor and in conscience, we are bound by our duty to ourselves and our duty to the country, to be able to say, if we vote for this resolution, that we have good reason to believe from evidence coming under our observation that the President of the United States has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors demanding his impeachment at our hands.

In what position do we find the President of the United States? Elected by a political party who, though they now propose to impeach him, bestowed upon him their full confidence for months after he assumed the executive chair, as evinced in the resolutions of their various conventions, the President at this time stands before the country surrounded by men of ability and personal integrity who are acting as his constitutional advisers, and whom, by the tenure-of-office act passed a few days ago, Congress has declared he shall not remove. Now, sir, if the President of the United States has been guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors imputed to him by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BURLER,] it cannot be possible that these officials who have been associated with him for nearly two years are not participes criminis in his proceedings. If you impeach him you impeach them, for the ground taken by both those gentlemen to whom I have referred is so broad that it must necessarily include in its moral effect every member of the Cabinet.

Now, sir, compare the nature of our action here to-day with the proceedings which have taken place in other free countries under corresponding circumstances, and in what attitude does the comparison place us before the world?

Look to the deliberation with which the British Parliament proceeded in the case of Warren Hastings, a Governor of a distant dependency. Look at those proceedings and contrast them with the hot haste in this Congress this day if this resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's six minutes have expired.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman from Massachusetts said that the President stood in the way of progress, not that he had neglected his duty, not that he had violated the Constitution, not that he had in any way violated his oath of office, but that he stood in the way of progress—progress as the gentleman understands it, not progress in the way of constitutional liberty, but in that of despotism.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman now yields me the remaining six minutes.

Mr. Speaker, when the question of the reference of the impeachment to the Committee on the Judiciary was made in this House I felt it to be my duty as a member of this body to vote for it. That investigation has now taken place. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported progress, and in that report they have given assurance to a large body of this House previous to the adjournment, and assurance to the whole country, that the impeachment of the President upon the charges of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] never will take place. They have deserted the ground they took. They now ask for a continuance of the investigation to cover the impotency of their efforts and the fallacy of their charges. That is my belief. So far as revolution is concerned, if ridicule could stop revolution the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] would. He would put the mask of Laughter on the Muse of Tragedy.

A more important matter than this, sir, has never been brought before this House. There can be no more solemn proceedings than those we have been considering to-day. I am willing, so far as the investigation can show to this country any crime on the part of the Chief Executive, to go on with it, but it must be carried on in a spirit of fairness and sincerity, and not for the purpose of political agitation and personal spite.

And the latter is the form this investigation has assumed. It has lost all the magnitude it had. It has dwindled into contemptible proportions. There is no fear now of the country from this agitation. They understand how weak and silly it is. There is no danger that the stock-jobbers will consider it at all. My colleague has given too much importance to the gentleman and his agitation. There is no danger that the stock-jobbers of Wall street will reward the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] even with a leather medal.

My colleague has alluded to the suffering in our commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests. The finances of the country are the cause; the legislation of the other side is the cause. Farmers are suffering because they have no markets for their products, because the great South is shut out from the mercantile community, and therefore the merchants of New York are without a market. It is not because the impotent resolutions of this Congress are flaunted before the country. That is not the reason commerce, manufactures, and agriculture are prostrated. The prostration of the country is the result of an inflated currency. It is the result of inflation in every department of industry; and, sir, the more the spirit of speculation and inflation is encouraged the more will our commerce, manufactures, and agriculture suffer.

So far, then, from this question of the impeachment being the cause, I look upon it as dead. It is dead and almost stinketh. It is offensive to the nostrils of our people. It is an impotent effort to continue this investigation after what we have seen and heard here to-day cannot get force enough to make it respectable.

Mr. BOYER. I desire the gentleman from Ohio to give me five minutes.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I suppose under the rule I myself have no time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time; debate is closed.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to reply to a single point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, yes!

Mr. BOYER. Will the Chair inform me what gentleman objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. BOYER. I shall remember the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. Better forget him. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the resolutions, they were adopted.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces that in appointing himself chairman of the Committee on the Rules he does so by order of the House, according to the usage of the last Congress.

The Clerk read the following appointments of committees:

Committee of Elections—Henry L. Dawes of Massachusetts, Glenn W. Scofield of Pennsylvania, Charles Upson of Michigan, Samuel S. Marshall of Illinois, Samuel Shellabarger of Ohio, Joseph W. McClurg of Missouri, Burton C. Cook of Illinois, Luke P. Poland of Vermont, John A. Nicholson of Delaware, and Michael C. Kerr of Indiana.

On the Judiciary—James F. Wilson of Iowa, George S. Boutwell of Massachusetts, Francis Thomas of Maryland, Thomas Williams of Pennsylvania, Frederick E. Woodbridge of Vermont, William Lawrence of Ohio, John C. Churchill of New York, Samuel S. Marshall of Illinois, and Charles A. Eldridge of Wisconsin.

On Mileage—George W. Anderson of Missouri, Tobias A. Plants of Ohio, Burt Van Horn of New York, Green B. Baum of Illinois, and J. Laurence Getz of Pennsylvania.

On the Rules—The Speaker, Elihu B. Washburne of Illinois, Nathaniel P. Banks of Massachusetts, James G. Blaine of Maine, and James Brooks of New York.

Joint Select Committee on Equalizing the Salaries of Officers of Congress—Frederick E. Woodbridge of Vermont, Ephraim R. Eckley of Ohio, and Hiram McCullough of Maryland.

Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment—Robert C. Schenck of Ohio, Charles H. Van Wyck of New York, Samuel J. Randall of Pennsylvania, John A. Logan of Illinois, and William B. Washburn of Massachusetts.

Regent of the Smithsonian Institution to fill the vacancy occasioned by the election of Mr. Patterson to the United States Senate—Luke P. Poland of Vermont.

SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask to be excused from service at the head of the joint select Committee on Retrenchment or as a member of that committee. It is an exceedingly important committee, has very much to do, and I find from experience upon it that it is impossible for me, consistent with my duties as chairman of another committee, to give my time and do justice to the duties that devolve upon me as chairman of that committee. I therefore ask the House to excuse me from service and to allow the Speaker to supply my place.

Mr. RANDALL. I object; the gentleman is a very useful member.

Mr. SCHENCK. I shall have to submit a motion, then, that I be excused. There is so much to be done requiring great care and labor upon that committee that I feel it impossible to give the attention to its duties which I think they demand. It is upon that ground merely that I ask to be excused. I would like exceedingly to be associated with my friend from Pennsylvania, as I have been heretofore; but I think the public service would be better answered by permitting me to be excused.

Mr. RANDALL. I will only say that in future the chairman of the Military Committee will probably not have so much to do as will prevent him from serving also on this committee.

Mr. SCHENCK was excused from service.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of H. A. B. Greenwood, claiming to have been elected to Congress from the third congressional district of Arkansas. I ask its reference to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay them on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it not in order to have the member-elect, if he is present, come forward upon the presentation of his credentials and be sworn in?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask if there was objection in such case. If there was none, then he would swear the member in. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has indicated his objection by moving to lay the credentials on the table.

The credentials were accordingly laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) supplementary to other joint resolutions, to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) extending the time for the completion of the improvement of Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to employ a clerk during this Congress at the compensation allowed the clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary; and that all papers in cases of contested elections be printed in whole or in part, at the discretion of said committee.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. The bill, I believe, has the approbation of all loyal men on the other side of the river. The scenes of yesterday render it absolutely necessary that it should be passed. I yield now for a moment to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] who was chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia during the last Congress.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that this question of repealing the law by which the county of Alexandria was restored to the State of Virginia was before the Committee for the District of Columbia of the last Congress; and the committee were unanimous, with the exception of one or two gentlemen belonging to the other side of the House, that this law should be repealed for many reasons.

We have, sir, now an additional reason, which did not exist at the time when this bill was before the committee, the reason alluded to by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which makes it the duty of the House to pass this bill at once, so that this county may be restored at once to the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I hope the gentleman will allow me five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I wish to inquire in the first place how this bill got before the House?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent. Mr. McCULLOUGH. I did not hear anything of it until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] took the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was probably indulging in conversation. The Clerk read the bill very audibly, and the Chair pounded the question very audibly whether there was any objection to its introduction.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. When this question was before the Committee for the District of Columbia, as I understand the matter only one side was heard, and if I am not mistaken it was understood then that no action should be taken upon the matter until those who are opposed to this retrocession should be heard. I am not aware that the matter has been agitated in the committee since that time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been a report upon this subject read here, but whether it be true or not the House is not informed. And I submit to the House whether they ought to pass a bill of this importance, involving, as it does, legal questions as to the right of Congress to pass such a law, questions which the chairman of the committee will remember were discussed by the committee without any investigation, and without any opportunity being afforded to those who opposed the retrocession to present their objections to it. The action of the committee was entirely ex parte.

Mr. STEVENS. I must now demand the previous question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Allow me one moment. Mr. STEVENS. I will allow the gentleman a word or two.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish only to correct a misapprehension under which my colleague on the Committee for the District of Columbia during the last Congress seems to be laboring; and that is in reference to no notice having been given to those citizens of Alexandria who are opposed to this measure. There was notice given to the leading men of Alexandria who are known to be opposed to this measure.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Who were they, and how was the notice given?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It was given verbally by Dr. Stewart, of Alexandria. I directed him personally to give timely notice that the committee would be in session for the consideration of this question upon a certain day; and I told him to be particular and notify the leading men of Alexandria who are opposed to the bill. Dr. Stewart informed the committee—I do not know whether the gentleman from Maryland was present when we had the matter under consideration or not—that he had given such personal notice, and if those who were opposed to the measure were not heard before the committee it was their own fault, for they had timely notice of the day when the committee would consider the subject.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I wish merely to say, in order to put myself right before the House, that I was not aware of the facts stated by the chairman of the committee of the last House. I know it was determined that those who were opposed to this bill should have a hearing, inasmuch as the bill involved serious legal questions. Those who are in favor of the passage of the bill were heard by the committee; and I never heard of the bill from that day to this.

Mr. INGERSOLL. One word in reply. Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; I cannot yield further. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. McCULLOUGH demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 28, not voting 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bowditch, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. O'NEILL said: I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. KELLEY, has been called home by sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF COMPOUND-INTEREST NOTES.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at the present time a joint resolution authorizing the application of part of the funds now in the Treasury to the redemption of compound-interest notes now outstanding.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. PRICE. I move to suspend the rules that I may introduce the joint resolution for consideration at the present time.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope the House will not begin already to tinker with the currency.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman will hear the resolution read I think he will not object to it.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I object to any tinkering with the currency at this time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reporting of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Although the reading of the resolution cannot be demanded on a motion to suspend the rules, yet as it is brief it will be read for information, unless objection be made.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution. It proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to use any and all money in the Treasury over and above $70,000,000 for the purpose of redeeming the compound-interest notes now outstanding as fast as the same shall be presented for redemption.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented, under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CULLOM: A petition signed by citizens of McLean county, Illinois, asking Congress to prevent the further withdrawal of legal tenders.

By Mr. KOONTZ: The petition of I. S. Milligan, heretofore referred, February 21, 1845.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, MARCH 8, 1867.

Prayer by Rev E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from B. B. French, late Commissioner of Public Buildings, asking for the appointment of the joint committee provided for by law to examine the accounts for repairing and furnishing the Executive Mansion; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of February 5, 1867, information in relation to an order issued by Lieutenant General Sherman in regard to the protection of trains on the overland route; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 2, 1867, a report of Major General Howard, Commissioner of Freedmen, &c., respecting extreme want and danger of starvation in several of the southern States.

Mr. STEWART. I move that that be referred to a select committee of seven.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary. You are on that committee.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Maria Raftery, widow of Patrick Raftery, late a corporal in the thirty-third regiment Massachusetts volunteers, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a memorial of a committee appointed by the River Improvement Convention, held in St. Louis February 13, 1867, composed of delegates from some ten or twelve States in the valley of the Mississippi, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. The memorial contains some very valuable statistical information, and I will therefore move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred, and the order to print will be made unless objected to.

Mr. GRIMES. The motion to print goes to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. CONNESS. Not necessarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule it will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONNESS. I think that question might as well be settled here. My understanding of the rule is that it is only a proposition to print extra copies that goes to the Committee on Printing. It has not been the practice to print memorials; I admit that; but there are cases where memorials are of great importance as in the present case, as stated by the Senator from Minnesota. I do not understand that a motion to print need go to the Committee on Printing under the rule unless it involves the printing of an extra number of copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are certain excepted cases. A motion to print memorials must go to the Committee on Printing. A law of Congress provides for it.

Mr. CONNESS. The chairman of the committee informs me that in this respect I am wrong. Therefore I ask that it be printed by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRIMES. Let it take its regular course. We meet here to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. We cannot be here to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be printed by unanimous consent; but under the rule it goes to the Committee on Printing. If there be no objection, it will be printed. The Chair hears none; and the order to print will be made.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of officers and privates of the twenty-first New York cavalry, praying for extra compensation, for the reason that they were mustered out of service in Utah and were compelled to pay nearly two hundred dollars each for transportation and subsistence to their homes, and received but eighty-four dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I present a petition of loyal citizens of Jefferson county, Arkansas, for the reduction of the semi-rebel State government in that State to a Territory, and the appointment of General Powell Clayton as Territorial Governor. As Congress have acted on that subject—

Mr. SUMNER. I do not understand that Congress has acted on that subject. I think that is the great question before us at the present session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. To what committee have you referred similar petitions presented by you?

Mr. SUMNER. They have not yet been referred to any committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I will ask that this petition lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have also a memorial of the so-called General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, asking for an appropriation of $2,500,000 for the construction of levees on the Mississippi river in that State. I ask leave to present it to the Senate and move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present a memorial of citizens of Louisiana, asking for aid of the Government in rebuilding their levees, and as a similar memorial has just been referred to the Committee on Finance, I move that this be referred to the same committee.

It was so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the memorial of a meeting of citizens of the State of South Carolina residing in Anderson district, praying the aid of Congress for the establishment of an orphan home for the education of orphans, white and colored, upon the labor-school plan, accompanied by a number of papers, which show that the movement is an important one, and I think will heartily meet the approbation of Congress. It is supported by a great number of citizens in that region of country, and very earnestly urged by clergymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church. If there is any way by which the Government of the United States could aid in such an object, I would be very glad to see it done. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad; which were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THAYER presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of Nebraska, in favor of the construction of a bridge across Platte river, and the construction of a military road from Platte river to the southern boundary of the State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of Nebraska, in favor of additional bounty to the troops from that Territory who served in the Army during the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of Nebraska, in favor of the extinguishment of the title of the Otoe and Missouri Indians to certain land in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of Nebraska, in favor of the establishment of a tri-weekly mail route from Maysville, Kansas, to Fort Kearney, in Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of Nebraska, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Elkhorn Station to Forest City, in Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of Nebraska, in favor of the establishment of a new land office at Columbus, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of Nebraska, in favor of the establishment of a daily mail route from America, Kansas, via Pawnee City, Tecumseh, and other points, to Columbus, Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Mrs. Mary A. Thomson, widow of Manlius V. Thomson, who commanded a regiment of United States volunteers from Kentucky in the war with Mexico, praying that she may be allowed arrearages of pension, her pension having been suspended for an alleged charge of "disloyalty and assisting in arming a rebel company," which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CORBETT presented the petition of Henry Failing, of Portland, Oregon, praying for the passage of an act requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue to him an Oregon war bond owned by him and which was lost or destroyed by the burning of the steamer Golden Gate at sea on the 27th of July, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of the heirs and representatives of Miss Harriet Pinckney, of South Carolina, the daughter of General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, praying that the United States direct tax commissioners for South Carolina be authorized and required to release Pinckney Island from confiscation for the non-payment of taxes, and that it be restored to them; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri concerning bounty due the regiments serving during the late war known as Missouri State militia; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, instructing the Representatives in Congress from that State to vote for aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad; which was ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the petition of Richard Busted, jr., late captain of battery C, Chicago light artillery, praying for a pension for injuries received by the recoil of a piece of artillery; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PRINTING OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand copies of the laws relating to internal revenue, have instructed me to report it with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the laws now in force, relating to the internal revenue, be printed for the use of the Senate, the same to be compiled under the direction and supervision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to add at the end of the resolution, "with index and marginal references."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial and papers in the case of R. McKee, late disbursing agent in California, with those relating to the claims of M. A. Estill and Pablo del a Poble, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the committee on Indian Affairs.

WOOL-TARIFF BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the act entitled "An act to regulate the trade in wool," be printed and distributed.

tled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes," be printed for the use of the Senate.

EXPEDITION AGAINST INDIANS.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate whether an armed expedition has been ordered by the War Department or other authority against the Indians of the western Territories; and, if so, that he communicate the instructions under which it was organized, as well as those which are to govern its operations; and that he further inform the Senate, in case such expedition has been ordered, against what tribe or tribes of Indians it is designed to wage war.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 27) authorizing the corporation of Washington city to make a loan and issue stock for building a market-house; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company of New York the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe, via the Bermudas and Azore Islands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce the following bills and joint resolutions; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. No. 29) for the relief of Hugh Leddy;

A bill (S. No. 35) for the relief of John F. Stewart; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) for the relief of Walter C. Whitaker.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) fixing the pay of the clerks at the Springfield armory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 30) to grant one million acres of public lands for the benefit of public schools in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 13) conferring upon territorial courts jurisdiction under the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 14) to provide for the payment of the claim of Martha A. Estill, administratrix of the estate of James M. Estill, deceased, Redrick McKee, and Pablo del a Pobia, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 32) to amend and simplify the acts relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 33) for the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S.

No. 34) authorizing the purchase of lands in Alabama under certain circumstances; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the bill (S. No. 9) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853, was taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. STEWART the following bills heretofore introduced by him were taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (S. No. 1) to reorganize the judiciary of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 2) to regulate certain proceedings in criminal cases; and

A bill (S. No. 3) concerning injunctions and proceedings in civil cases.

NATIONAL MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 31) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States,'" approved March 21, 1866.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the effect of it?

Mr. WILSON. It is important to pass the bill to-day for a reason which I will state. By law the management of this Asylum is committed to a board of twelve members—the Chief Justice, the President, the Secretary of War, and nine other persons. They are compelled by law to meet four times a year. Their quarterly meeting is at this time: they have business of great importance to attend to. Some of the gentlemen, as the Governor of New Hampshire and the Attorney General of New York, have left other important business to come here to this meeting. They have been unable thus far to get a quorum of the board; there are only six present. One member, who would make a quorum, cannot act, because he has been elected a member of Congress. The board have unanimously asked to have the law changed in that respect which excludes members of Congress from being members of the board. If we pass the bill promptly to-day the board can proceed to act and dispose of their business; if not, there is no telling when they will be able to get a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is this bill to repeal the provision that excludes members of Congress?

Mr. WILSON. This bill simply strikes out of the law of last year the words "not members of Congress," one of the board having been elected to Congress.

The bill was read three times, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that Mr. FREDERICK E. WOODBRIDGE of Vermont, Mr. EPHRAIM R. ECKLEY of Ohio, and Mr. HIRAM McCULLOUGH of Maryland, had been appointed members of the joint select Committee on Equalizing the Salaries of Officers of Congress on the part of the House, under the concurrent resolution of the House authorizing that committee.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to renew and continue the joint select Committee on Retrenchment during the Fortieth Congress.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2) to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia, and for other purposes," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution, (S. R. No. 2,) supplementary to other joint resolutions, to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) extending the time for the completion of the improvement of Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

RELIEF OF FREEDMEN.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I propose to have this joint resolution referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and with the indulgence of the Chair I desire to invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to the early consideration of the subject. On a former day, near the close of the late session, a similar resolution for a larger sum, $20,000 I believe, was passed by the Senate, but it failed to receive the consideration of the House of Representatives. I then had occasion to state to the Senate what I understood to be the necessities of this class of people in this District, and I think the honorable chairman will find that they commend themselves very strongly to his sense of humanity and charity. I hope the resolution will receive the early attention of the chairman of that committee.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that this subject was examined thoroughly by the Committee on the District of Columbia at the last Congress, and was acted on favorably by the Senate. I perceive, therefore, no necessity for referring it to the committee as now organized; and hence I move that it be taken up for consideration now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution at this time. Is there objection? No objection being made, the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was read. It proposes to appropriate $15,000 for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen and Refugees.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO GEORGE PEABODY.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) which is now printed and on the table of the Senators. I submit a motion to that effect.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I hope sincerely that there can be no question on this resolution. It expresses the thanks of Congress for an act which is great in itself and also great as an example. I can recall no instance in history where a private person during life has bestowed so large a sum in charity. Few after death have done so much. The bequest of Smithson, which Congress accepted with honor, and which is the foundation of the institution which receives our annual care, was much less than the donation of Mr. Peabody for purposes of education in the South and southwestern States, to be distributed among the whole populace without any distinction other than in the needs and the opportunities of usefulness to them. I hail this benefaction as of especial value now, first as a contribution to education, which is a sacred cause never to be forgotten in a Republic; secondly, as a charity to a distressed part of our country which needs the help of education; and thirdly, as an endowment for the equal benefit of all without any distinction of caste. As it is much in itself, so I cannot but think that it will be most fruitful as an example. Individuals and communities will be moved to do more in the same direction, and impartial education may be added to recent triumphs.

I shall not be led to consider the difference between the widow's mite and the rich man's endowment, except to remark that when a charity is so large as to become historic it is necessarily taken out of the category of common life. Standing apart by itself it challenges attention and fills the mind. It receives homage and gratitude. Such, I am sure, has been the prevailing sentiment of our country toward Mr. Peabody. In voting this resolution Congress will only give expression to the popular voice.

I should be sorry to have it understood that the thanks of Congress could be won only in war. Peace has victories which deserve honor also. A public benefactor is a conqueror in the perpetual conflict with evil. He, too, meets the enemy face to face. Let him have something of the rewards of victory.

Already in England our benefactor has signalized himself by a generous endowment of the poor. The sum he gave was large, but not so large as he has now given for education in our country. The sentiments of the British people found expression through the Queen, who honored him with a present and with an autograph letter declaring her grateful sense of his beneficence. Kindred sentiments may justly find expression through Congress, which is empowered to write the autograph of the American people.

If it be said that this vote is without precedent, I reply that this is a mistake. You voted thanks to Mr. Vanderbilt for the present of a steamer, and to Mr. Field for generous enterprise in establishing the telegraphic cable between the two continents. But even if there were no precedent, then do I say make a precedent. Your vote will be less unprecedented than his generosity.

At this moment, when we are engaged in the work of reconstruction, this endowment for purposes of education in the southern and southwestern States is most timely. Education is one of the foundation-stones of that republican government which we seek to establish. On this account again let us honor the benefactor.

I have not asked a reference to a committee, because it seemed to me that the resolution was of such a character that the Senate would be glad to act upon it directly. The thanks we offer will be of more value if promptly offered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not know that any objection will be made to the adoption of this resolution; and I rise only because my intimacy, which dates back further than 1820, with the gentleman whom it is proposed to honor, has been such that it is perhaps proper that I should say a word before the resolution is adopted.

Mr. Peabody, I believe, is a native of Massachusetts by birth; but he came to Baltimore very early. I found him there in 1817 when I moved to the city, and was associated with him at that time in the relation of attorney to client, and have ever since watched his progress in life. I had the pleasure of meeting him in London in 1845, and again in 1854, and had an opportunity of knowing the manner in which he conducted himself there, and the very decided influence in favor of the United States which his conduct caused. He sustained the credit of the States when it was at a very low ebb, and he did that particularly in relation to the public debt of Maryland. For Maryland he had an attachment just as great as he had for his native State of Massachusetts, and he evinced it on all occasions. On every returning anniversary of our national independence he selected around him all the Americans of respectability whom he could find in London, with many members of the British Parliament and other distinguished men of that nation; and those entertainments were so conducted that they served very much to preserve the good relations which have so long subsisted, or at least which did subsist up to the breaking out of the late civil war in which we have been engaged, between that country and the United States. And I have every reason to believe that during the pendency of the rebellion he was always a firm and consistent friend of the Union, never hesitating to express his opinion as to what would be the probable result, and always cautioning his friends in the South, for he had many there, against what he deemed not only an unjustifiable, but an insane effort; and since the termination of the war he has taken a course which I think entitles him to the honor of the nation and to the honor of the world. He has tried by all the means in his power to bring about in feeling as well as in fact a restoration of the relations which at one time so happily subsisted between the citizens of the rebellious States and those of the other States.

The gift which he has made, which has properly been stated by the honorable member from Massachusetts to be almost without precedent, is calculated—and I know is so esteemed by the southern mind—to fix in their mind an opinion that there is, in the judgment of the respectable portion of the loyal States, (they believing that what he says reflects but the real sentiment of that portion of the loyal States), an anxious desire to see them again in our midst, with all their original rights, just as they were before the rebellion. I should hope, therefore—and I cannot doubt that such will be the result—that the thanks of Congress would be at once, and with unanimity, tendered for this extraordinary, in point of example, endowment, looking to the accomplishment of an end in which not only the southern, but all the other States are so deeply interested, general education.

Mr. TIPTON. It is not astonishing, Mr. President, that I should be solicitous in regard to the manner in which I should cast my first vote in this body. I acknowledge that solicitude on this occasion, and regret exceedingly that I feel impelled to say anything on this question at this time. Before I could vote for this resolution I should desire to understand most emphatically the position that was occupied by the donor during the time of our recent struggle for national existence. I am inclined, however, because of the source whence this resolution comes, to infer that all was right in that behalf; but I ask for no enlightenment on that point, because I am against the adoption of this resolution, not on account of any consultation with any member of this body, but from principle. If I need any justification for my course on this occasion I desire it to be understood that, if I am the representative of anybody on the floor of this Senate, I am the representative of an humble constituency; with such a constituency on the frontier I have been and shall hereafter be identified; and when I know positively that I have constituents of as pure intentions in behalf of education and science and art as the grantor of this charity can be, and when I remember that some of them have done all that men could do in a private capacity, and when I see this gentleman making a munificent grant in a private capacity, I cannot consent to shower on him the thanks and the honors of the Senate when I am not able to vote them to the humblest of my constituency who have done equally well, having done what they were able to do; and he has done no more. I hope now that on that subject I am understood, and will be understood hereafter in all my future action as a member of this body.

So far as the munificence of this grant as regards the amount is concerned, I concede it. Other wealthy men of our country have granted by thousands and tens of thousands for educational purposes; and they have received the thanks of corporations and the thanks of States, and they will receive them again. If this grant had been for educational purposes in Nebraska I should not have come here for a national indorsement for the grantor, but should have secured that indorsement from the recipients of the charity from my own constituency in Nebraska. It is legitimate, it is proper, for the people who are to be benefited by this grant to show their gratitude by gold medals or in any other manner that they choose to express it. They have in Louisiana, as I discover, already indicated their gratitude by a resolution, perhaps, of their legislative body. This is but a private grant, munificent as it may be; and when millions were at the disposal of the donor it was easier for him to contribute millions than for many men to contribute a hundred or a thousand.

If this were a national gift, if it stood on the basis of the Smithsonian grant, I would, as a matter of course, be willing to vote the thanks of the Congress of the United States; but it stands in no national position whatever, and therefore that cannot be claimed for it. In making this grant the donor, I understand, declared that he did it as a duty. If it is done as a Christian charity, as a Christian duty, he has his reward hereafter and the consciousness of it here, and I am not disposed to doubt the ability of the Almighty to reward him to the utmost, and I do not suppose it is necessary for me to help the Deity out by granting a gold medal here. I prefer to leave him to his golden reward hereafter. I think he also says that he regards it as a privilege to make this gift. Sir, it is a privilege, a privilege that few men will ever have; and the benefits of the privilege are great—distinction among men here, honor after death—for having granted so much for so great a charity. I say, therefore, that if it had all been for the benefit of my own constituency I should not have voted a national medal for him, but would be lavish of the honors of Nebraska individually upon him for the munificence of the grant. With this view of the question, impelled to it from a sense of duty, I cannot and will not make any distinction between the giver of a dollar and the giver of a thousand and the giver of a million, when each in his sphere and in his capacity has done all that it was possible for him to do in behalf of education and science and general literature.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I propose calling for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this resolution in order that the record may be made up. I confess I do not see any analogy between this great donation for public, I may almost say national, objects and ordinary charitable contributions made by our citizens. I do not see that in expressing the sense of our people on this occasion we make an invidious distinction among persons who are disposed to acts of charity and beneficence. This gentleman, although a native of the United States, has been in point of fact a British merchant; he has resided in a foreign country during the greater portion of his life; and he has acquired his wealth, his property, by being concerned in foreign commerce. He now comes to this country and bestows these donations upon a charitable object, to be expended within our own limits. I think the case stands upon very different grounds from a case of donation by one of our own people, of property acquired in the pursuits of life among us, to an object of local, of State, or of general beneficence. Whatever may have been the considerations legitimate upon the introduction of a measure of this kind, whatever question there may have been as to the propriety of introducing it, I should think it very unfortunate, to say the least, if, having been introduced, it should not be adopted, and adopted by a pretty unanimous vote of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. I ask that the question on the passage of the resolution, when taken, be taken by the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. Before the resolution is passed I merely wish to remark that I think it was a little unfortunate that the Senator from Massachusetts cited Vanderbilt's case as a precedent for this. If I thought this resolution rested upon any such grounds as the vote of thanks to Vanderbilt I should certainly vote against it, whereas I expect to vote for it. The resolution for Mr. Vanderbilt was passed without any investigation of how much money he had made out of the Government, with which he had large transactions. It has unfortunately happened to me to have been a passenger on some of Mr. Vanderbilt's steamers. A resolution of this kind ought to imply that the person who is honored is a good man, deserving the thanks of the nation. I do not believe anybody who is acquainted with Vanderbilt's transactions or who ever traveled on his steamers will pronounce him to be a humane man. Any one who witnessed the suffering of one trip would be shocked at a proposition to give him a vote of thanks for any purpose. I regret that that name has been mentioned on an occasion like this. I hope that in the case now before us the thanks of the nation will be tendered to this gentleman, who has been so liberal and who has acquired so much reputation by his liberal donations. I hope his private charities, which we do not know and do not hear of, will correspond with his public charities, which have filled the world, and I hope this resolution will do much good toward the object which it is designed to further, the cause of general education.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time.

The question on the passage of the resolution being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 86, nays 2; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Colden, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sausbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tayer, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Grimes and Tipton—2.
ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Conness, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Guthrie, Harlan, Howard, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wiley—15.

So the joint resolution was passed.

LIQUOR IN THE CAPITOL.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to reconsider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) to prevent the sale or use of liquors in the Capitol building.

The resolution declares it unlawful for any person to bring or, directly or indirectly, to cause to be brought, into the Capitol building, or into any building pertaining thereto, any spirituous or malt liquors, wine or cider, for sale or use, or for any other purpose; and any officer or employé of the Government who shall in any manner violate or connive at or countenance the violation of this resolution is to be summarily dismissed from office; and it is to be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives, under the supervision of the Presiding Officers of their respective Houses, to enforce the provisions of the resolution under the same penalties for neglect or refusal to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps nobody is more opposed to the use of drinks of that sort in the Capitol than I am, but it seems to me this resolution is carrying the thing to an extreme. It prohibits anything of that sort from coming into the Capitol in any way. Suppose a member of Congress who has been in the habit of taking a drink in the course of the day brings liquor into the Capitol himself, is he to be punished, is he to be dismissed, or is an employé whom he may ask to supply him in that particular to be dismissed for obeying the request, almost in the nature of an order, of a member of Congress? I doubt very much the propriety of passing a resolution like this. I think it is rather an impeachment of Congress, which I am very unwilling to make unless it be absolutely necessary.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me to be a plain duty to pass the resolution. This Capitol ought to be free from the use of intoxicating drinks. We have had exhibitions enough of that kind, and if there are any honors in it they cluster around us thick enough now. Officers and employés of the Senate ought not to convert their rooms into drinking-saloons or bar-rooms. It is time to put a stop to such action; and to speak plainly, I think the time has come when no committee-room of this body shall be converted into a bar-room. I propose on that question to take the judgment of the Senate. There are buildings away from this Capitol where drinking can be carried on. I propose, therefore, to clean intoxicating drinks out of this Capitol, out of the committee-rooms, out of the rooms of the officers of the Senate, out of the rooms below. I hope that every Senator and every member of the House of Representatives will vote for this resolution, and that we shall clear this Capitol of intoxicating drinks, and that they will come back to torment us no more.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I myself am as much in favor of temperance as the Senator from Massachusetts, I think; I have not been in the habit, as most of the Senators know, of drinking; but I think that the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts are calculated to mislead the public in regard to drinking in this Capitol. He talks of committee-rooms being made liquor-shops. Sir, I have served here for many years, not quite as long as the Senator from Massachusetts, but I never saw a particle of liquor in any committee-room.

Mr. JOHNSON. Nor I.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I recollect that a few years ago a Senator from New Hampshire, not now a member, made some remarks in regard to drinking in the Capitol; and I remember, after a I returned home to Illinois, being questioned in regard to intoxication about the building, and I was inquired of if it was true that liquor was furnished to the little pages, boys a dozen years old, who were said to be intoxicated. I had forgotten the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire; but they misled the country. I never knew and never heard of a page being intoxicated. I have never seen liquor for sale about this Capitol; and if the Senator from Massachusetts finds it he goes to places that I do not know of.

I am in favor of keeping liquor out of the Capitol; but this is no new proposition. A joint rule of the two Houses of Congress adopted years and years ago prohibits the sale of liquors within the Capitol. The 19th joint rule adopted thirty years ago reads as follows:

"No intoxicating liquors shall be offered for sale, or exhibited within the Capitol, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto."

If liquors are kept for sale in this Capitol, the remedy is to enforce the rule. If any officer has had liquors for sale here it has been in violation of the rule. If the rooms of officers about this Capitol are filled with liquor, let them be expelled. But I think the country will be misled by the statement of my friend from Massachusetts. It is that to which I object, not to the removal of the liquor. I desire that there should be none about the Capitol; but I am sure that if the Senator's remarks go out without any comment the country will draw an erroneous impression in regard to drinking about this building. If there be about this building liquors for sale I do not know it; it has never come under my observation. I know of no place in the Capitol where you can purchase liquors, and I know of no person that has them for sale. And so far as the committee-rooms are concerned, I have served upon different committees during the time I have been a member of this body, and I have never seen in the room of any committee of which I have been a member intoxicating liquors, and have never known of it. I am quite sure there are none in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; I do not believe the Committee on Naval Affairs have liquors in their room, or that the chairman of the Committee of Finance keeps them in his room. Where are they?

All I desired was to correct the impression that I thought would be drawn from the Senator's remarks. That members of the Senate and officers of the Senate drink liquor sometimes, is doubtless true; unfortunately perhaps, some of them drink more than they ought to; but it is not true that the committee-rooms are liquor shops so far as I know, and I do not know that the measure which the Senator from Massachusetts now has in hand will correct the evil. I suppose if men are determined to drink they will get liquor in some way. They will perhaps carry the whisky in their pockets or manage in some way to obtain it. I am willing to unite with the Senator from Massachusetts and make it as inconvenient to them as we can. All I desired was that an erroneous impression shall not go abroad as to the condition of things in the Capitol.

Mr. WILSON. I have no disposition to magnify the evil of bringing liquors into this Capitol; in fact it would take more powers than I have to magnify it. The Senator tells us he has never seen liquor sold here. Never saw liquor sold here! Was he never in "the-hole-in-the-wall?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not know there was one.

Mr. WILSON. When I first came here we had what was called "the-hole-in-the-wall," and it was only closed up three or four years ago. I never saw the Senator there, but I have been there.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Has not that been closed up for years?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; for three or four years.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it was abolished several years ago.

Mr. WILSON. A few years ago. It was impossible to go into that place to get a cup of tea when we were sitting here at night without witnessing the sale of liquors. It is but a very short time ago when an officer in this Capitol kept his whisky-jug here, and it was visited by persons in our employment, and by officers of the Government. There is a room now that has been a drinking-place this winter; a room under the care of an officer of the Senate. I do not say that the committee-rooms generally are used for such purposes, but there are rooms that are so used, and if the Senator does not know it he ought not to question the word of those who do know it. I suggest to the Senator that it is not prudent for him to push that matter too far.

In my judgment, since the foundation of the Government, there has never been a Congress so free from the use of intoxicating liquors as the Thirty-Ninth Congress. It was better than the Thirty-Eighth, and the Thirty-Eighth was better than the Thirty-Seventh, and the Thirty-Seventh was better than its predecessor. There has been a steady and marked improvement during the fourteen sessions I have been here in that respect. The House of Representatives of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, was a most remarkable body in this respect. I think there is a great improvement in the Senate, and I hope there will be an improvement in the Fortieth Congress over the Thirty-Ninth in both Houses. This proposition simply makes it illegal to bring liquors here for sale or for use, forbids their sale, and authorizes the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses to see that they are not brought here. I hope we shall all concur in passing this resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not hear the resolution read; but I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that it merely makes the bringing of liquor into the Capitol building illegal. If that is all, it is entirely too tame, because it has always been illegal; it should be made criminal, and the party guilty of the crime should be arrested. If we mean anything, let us be thorough about it. Declaring a thing illegal, without providing further than that, does not mean anything. I do not know anything about the evil of which the Senator from Massachusetts speaks, and the correction of which he seeks. I have been here six years, and I confess I never saw a gill or any other quantity of spirits in or about this building. The thing may be all around here, but I never saw it. I never saw the "hole-in-the-wall." I do not know where that is; perhaps I have not been here long enough; but if there is any such place it should be abated as a nuisance; and it should be made a crime for officers or any persons to bring liquor in here, and those guilty of the offense should be treated as criminals. That is the ground to put it on.

Mr. GRIMES. The general remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to liquors being introduced into the committee-rooms of the Senate impels me to say a single word in vindication of the gentlemen who have been upon committees with which I have been associated during the last eight years. I believe it is now seven years since I have been the chairman, and had in a degree the charge of a committee-room, and been associated with various gentlemen in that room. I have nothing to say as to what my own habits are; but I will bear testimony to the fact that no one of those gentlemen has ever at any time introduced, or been instrumental in introducing, or so far as I know desired to introduce, liquors, malt or spirituous, of any kind or description, into any of the committee-rooms where I have been.

Having said this much, I desire to be informed by the Senator from Massachusetts if a couple of years ago we did not adopt a new rule, in addition to that which has been cited by the Senator from Illinois, upon this very subject.

Mr. WILSON. We passed it here; but it failed.

Mr. GRIMES. Failed?

Mr. WILSON. It went to a conference committee, and never got through.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I desire to know if we did not appoint a Committee at that time to take this subject into consideration, of which the Senator himself was chairman, and which committee failed to report, upon the ground that the existing law and rules were already sufficient. I have not the slightest objection to the passage of this joint resolution if it is deemed necessary; but the general declarations made in regard to it are rather two sweeping to allow it to pass without remark.

Mr. ANTHONY. While I am willing to cooperate in any legislation that the Senator from Massachusetts may think necessary to prevent the introduction of spirituous liquors here, I am very glad that the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Iowa have made the remarks which they have made. I do not think it is right to send out the impression to the country that the members of this body and the House of Representatives and our officers are men who are addicted to the intemperate use of spirituous liquors. I think that the allegation is entirely incorrect. I do not think there can be found anywhere a body of cultivated men as numerous as this in which there are so few members addicted to the use of spirituous liquors. A very large number of the members of this body never drink even wine, and a very considerable number who take wine drink nothing stronger. I know that two years ago at "the hole in the wall" there was liquor sold; but since the Senator from Massachusetts introduced his resolution, which I thought passed, but which he says failed, prohibiting the use of spirituous liquors in the Capitol, I do not believe there has been any liquor sold in this building. Certainly I am not aware of its having been sold. If any officer has had spirituous liquor in his room I am not aware of the fact. I do not think that such an impression ought to go out to the country. I was shocked very much at a speech made by a Senator, not now a member of this body, which has already been referred to, in which he spoke of the pages of this Chamber being taught to use ardent spirits by officers and members of this body. I never saw the least indication of it; nothing of the kind ever came under my observation, and I felt very much grieved that such an impression should go out. During the close of the last Congress, when we were up here all night for two or three nights, and nearly all night for a week, I saw less evidences of the intemperate use of spirituous liquors than I ever saw before in this body. I was invited to several places where there were refreshments—the Secretary in his room had refreshments provided, very proper and very comfortable for the occasion—but I saw nothing stronger there than coffee, nor did I in the rooms on the House side to which I was invited. I simply rose in order that these sweeping allegations against the two Houses of Congress should not go to the country uncontradicted.

Mr. WILSON. I object to any statement that any declarations I have made are calculated to give a false impression to the country. I simply said that I did not desire to see liquor sold in any part of this Capitol, nor the rooms of any officers here, nor the committee-rooms used for such purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood the Senator to say that the committee-rooms were bar-rooms.

Mr. WILSON. No sir. I said I did not desire to see the committee-rooms turned into bar-rooms, without charging that any considerable number of them had been so used. I take it the Senator knows what has been done for years past, and he knows how much better this last Congress was in that respect than any other Congress. The country notes the fact and applauds it. There is very little drinking in Congress now compared to other times, but there is still too much of it, and it ought to be banished so far as we can do it. Drinking is not general, but it should not exist to any extent whatever; at any rate, liquors should not be sold nor brought into this Capitol. Let us banish the cup of intoxication from the Capitol of the nation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought I had voted for a resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts on this subject at the last session, and I thought we had swept out of existence the evil of which he complains this morning.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me to explain. Two years ago we passed a resolution to stop the open sale of liquor in this Capitol. At the last session, as the open sale had been abolished, I desired to clear it out altogether, and prevent also the sale of ale and cider and such things. That resolution proposed to go a step further than the previous one; but it was not finally passed. It did not receive the concurrence of both Houses in such a shape as to be effective. I propose now to remedy the failure then, and to begin this new Fortieth Congress with the Capitol entirely clear of liquor of any kind or description, and to prevent its being brought here, either for sale or use.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am a friend of the measure proposed by the Senator, if it is necessary. Of that I have but very little knowledge. The committee-rooms are not under the control of myself to any extent; and I was very much gratified to hear what was said by the Senator at the head of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] the Senator at the head of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. GRIMES,] and the Senator at the head of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. POMEROY.] As it has been the pleasure of the majority to assign me to duty upon those three committees, and as I had never heard of any liquor being in those rooms, I thought perhaps that, being in the minority, I was not regarded as entitled to equal rights, [laughter,] and that in the enjoyment of the hospitalities of the committee-rooms I had been excluded, [laughter,] and my sensibilities were somewhat excited by the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts. Now, sir, this matter can be easily regulated. Every chairman of a committee—of course it is proper and right it should be so—is of the majority party in this body. Just let there be a caucus, and let a resolution be passed in caucus that the chairmen shall not allow any liquors in their rooms, and I think it will be effective; for I know of no influence in this body or in Congress so potential as the decision and ruling and decree of a caucus. Now, if the gentlemen will just go into caucus and pass a resolution of that kind I have not the least fear it will be violated.

Mr. CONNESS. I would remind the Senator that it is not the habit to caucus on constitutional questions.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then this is not a constitutional question, I understand from the Senator from California, though it touches the individual constitution of some Senators, as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing to vote for this or any other bill short of putting to death a man who shall take a drink of liquor; I would not go that far; I would vote for anything short of making Senators spies; I would not go that far. I believe this resolution is within the limits I suggest, and therefore I can support it; but I do not think the world will be much further on in the line of progress after it is adopted. I would not have it understood when I vote for it that I consider that this accomplishes everything we need.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe it would be a good act of police to exclude from this Capitol all spirituous liquors. The only objection I have to this proposition is the manner of doing it, and especially to the phraseology of the resolution. This is not a place for the sale, purchase, or drinking of liquors. If I want any I can go outside and get them without much trouble. I should have no objection if the resolution went further and prohibited the roasting of meat and the cooking of vegetables; &c., just below us, poisoning the air which we are compelled to breathe. I think all the eating that is necessary may be provided for in the central building, where it will not poison the breath we are compelled to inhale, not very pure at best. I hope the proper officers of the Senate will take charge of that matter, and if possible exclude the provision stalls from beneath us and put them where they will be accessible to the Senate, and yet at the same time not poison our breaths.

The language of this joint resolution is entirely too strong. It first provides that it shall be "unlawful to bring or, directly or indirectly, to cause to be brought" into this building any liquors of any kind; and then it provides, "and any officer or employé of the Government who shall in any manner violate or connive at or countenance"—words that ought never to be used in any criminal statute—"the violation of this resolution shall be summarily dismissed from office." So if a Senator—

Mr. WILSON. That does not apply to a Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. It applies to every one in office. So that if a Senator should bring in a vial of medicine containing alcohol, he would be liable to be summarily dismissed from office, because the resolution declares it unlawful "to bring or, directly or indirectly, to cause to be brought into the Capitol building" any liquor, and makes liable to summary dismissal from office "any officer or employé of the Government who shall in any manner violate or connive at or countenance the violation of this resolution." It seems to me that latter part ought to be stricken out. If the Senate will strike it out, I will vote for the resolution as it will then stand, declaring it unlawful to bring liquors into the building, and that the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, under the supervision of the Presiding Officers, shall see that the prohibition is enforced. I think that will be sufficient. That will be an indication of the sense of Congress against the practice of bringing liquor here, and will give our officers authority to abate the nuisance. I do not like to vote for a measure that for so trivial or venial an offense as this would be regarded by a great many persons would render a man liable to be summarily removed from office. With the modification I propose, I shall vote for the resolution with pleasure. I move to amend the resolution by striking out these words:

And any officer or employé of the Government who shall in any manner violate or connive at or countenance the violation of this resolution shall be summarily dismissed from office.

Mr. WILSON. I think the criticism of the Senator from Ohio is not well founded. This resolution simply declares it "unlawful for any person"—and that includes Senators, and there is no reason why it should not apply to them as well as to other persons—"to bring or, directly or indirectly, to cause to be brought into the Capitol building" any liquors of any description; and then it proceeds to provide, "and any officer or employé of the Government who shall in any manner violate or connive at or countenance the violation of this resolution"—that applies to the persons we employ here who engage in this business in any way whatever—"shall be summarily dismissed from office; and it shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives, under the supervision of the Presiding Officers of their respective Houses, to enforce the provisions of this resolution." I think it is right as it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to refer this resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will simply say that I wish this resolution referred that it may be put in proper form. I think it is a very small business to exclude a gentleman from drinking a glass of sweet cider at dinner.

Mr. WILSON. I did not hear the Senator's remark. I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I say I think the resolution requires amendment. I think it is very absurd to exclude a glass of sweet cider at dinner at the restaurant.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator desires it he can vote for it. I hope the Senate will clear this Capitol of intoxicating drinks of every kind and description.

Mr. WILLEY. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will allow this resolution to be referred. There seems to be a contrariety of opinion in regard to its form, and I think myself the circumstances are such as to indicate the propriety of that course, so that it may be considered in a careful and proper manner, and that we may have something presented to the Senate that will not be out of order or in conflict with a sense of propriety. I hope the Senator will make no objection to its reference. I am sure it will come back in a short time in a form that will be acceptable to the whole Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I do not suppose the Senate will remain here a great while, and I think we ought to settle this question at the commencement. I think the men we leave behind us ought to understand that the Capitol cannot be profaned in that way while we are absent. If I were sure we had time enough I would not object to the reference. I have no objection to the committee to whom it is proposed to be referred, for we all know it is a most excellent committee, and I have perfect confidence in them and would trust them on this or any other question.

As to the wording of the resolution let me say that it cannot very well be improved. It was drawn with great care, and means exactly what it says. I do not see how a word can be put in or taken out of it that does not affect what it does say. It was carefully drawn, carefully written, carefully studied in every respect. There is no need of referring it to anybody to change it, unless the purpose for which it is introduced is to be changed. If that is true, then it may be changed. I do not, therefore, see any need of a reference. I think we may as well pass it now. The House of Representatives, I find, are anxious to get away next Monday. I am told that they have agreed that when they adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. I think it important that we should act on this matter now, and therefore I am opposed to referring it to any committee whatever. It is a plain and simple proposition, drawn in clear language. Any man can understand it at a glance and see what it means.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the Senator from Massachusetts is chairman, and then it would not only be in the hands of most excellent men, but men who would report the most summary measures for executing it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If this matter is to be referred, I desire that it should be a little broader than it is, so that, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested, the committee should take into consideration the location of the restaurant beneath us. I think that the cooking immediately under the Senate Chamber is very objectionable. It should be removed to some other part of the building, if there is any other part to which it could be removed; I do not know that there is. I wish that the committee might also take into consideration the removal or change in some way of this restaurant below.

Mr. WILSON. There is no sort of difficulty about that. The Presiding Officer of the Senate can take care of that matter and provide that it shall not be done below here. I am not anxious about the cooking. I do not think there is any need of any resolutions or any legislation on that subject. On the other, I have no question that there is. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will pass the resolution as it now stands without a reference, because if it is referred we may not reach it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer this resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Howe, Johnson, Norton, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Dixon, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wilson, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Edmunds, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Nye, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Williams—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2) to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria in the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia," and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, if there be no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say that it involves a legal question, and it is proper that it should be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 10) granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims in a certain cause involving the right to the use of a patent, have instructed me to report it back, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

I will state before the motion is put, that this is a bill to authorize a gentleman by the name of Babcock to bring a suit against the United States for the use of his patent, which is for a bronzing-machine, before the Court of Claims. The Committee on the Judiciary were of opinion that the United States should not suffer itself to be sued in any court; that if the Government has made use of the patent of this gentleman, he has a just claim against the Government if his invention is one of any value and the Government has used it. While the committee are of opinion that the Government ought to pay for its use if it has been used, they think it would be improper to allow the Government to be sued in such cases, because if a suit were allowed in this case it would be in every other where a patentee supposed the Government had infringed upon his patent right, and least of all would it be proper for the Court of Claims to take jurisdiction of such a case. That court has no machinery to try it; no juries are empaneled in that court; witnesses are not examined in the court; all the testimony is taken in writing; and it would be improper in any event to send it there. As it is a subject with which the Committee on Patents are familiar and can determine whether the Government has made use of the invention of this gentleman, I am instructed by the Committee of the Judiciary to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and to move its reference to the Committee on Patents.

The report was agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WILSON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entertained if there be no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not object to the introduction of the motion, but I hope we shall not adjourn over. We do not want to stay here unnecessarily; I hope we may be able to adjourn next week, and I think we had better come here to-morrow and receive messages from the President and refer them.

Mr. CONNESS. I think so, too.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for a division; and before the vote is taken I desire simply to repeat what was not heard perhaps from the Senator from Rhode Island, that this adjournment is simply to continue us here, while if we meet to-morrow and receive messages from the President we can adjourn finally the sooner. It is not like the beginning of a session where business is not prepared. If Senators desire to remain here during the season, then it is very well to adjourn over Saturday; otherwise, I think we ought to do our business and leave.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not desire to prolong this discussion. I have only this to say: if the President has any communications to make to us, he can make them to-day or Monday or any time. I have not had any notice myself that he has any. He has served no notice on me that he is going to send any.

Mr. JOHNSON. He must send them. There are a great many here already.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In conversation with the Postmaster General yesterday, he informed me that the operations of that Department are very much embarrassed in consequence of the want of officers. During the last Congress it is well known that many were rejected, and the business of the Post Office is now carried on by clerks, and large amounts of the public money are now subject to their care without the proper bond. He is making every effort to have proper appointments made, or appointments that will be acceptable to the Senate made, so that this embarrassment under which the Post Office Department now labors may be done away with. I trust the Senate will remain in session to-morrow for that purpose if for no other.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The embarrassment spoken of by the Senator from Rhode Island does not lie at the door of Congress. It will be remembered that most of the nominations which he speaks of as being rejected were sent to us during the last twenty-four hours of the session; some of them within twelve hours. Nominations in the Post Office Department, where the appointments had been made before Congress convened in December, were withheld from the Senate till within twelve hours of its adjournment in many instances. How it was possible for the Senate to examine these numerous nominations sent in at that late hour I do not know. If there is any embarrassment in the Post Office Department, in the Treasury Department, or in any other Department of this Government, the fault lies somewhere else than with the Senate for rejecting nominations. We had no opportunity to reject or confirm most of these nominations till within twenty-four hours of our adjournment under the Constitution. I do not think that affords any reason why the Senate should meet to-morrow to receive nominations which were withheld from us for three months, while we were in session here and prepared to act upon them, and sent to us in the hurry of the expiring hours of the session.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is not a question as to who is to blame at all. I did not raise that question. Whether the President is to blame or the Secretaries are to blame is a question not introduced into the remarks that I suggested. The question is as to the embarrassment of the Department, and from what is known to the Senate it is evident that the Departments and the President are making efforts to relieve the Senate of its embarrassment as regards confirming or rejecting nominations; in other words, that there are nominations now that will probably be sent that will be made acceptable to the Senate; and in that regard it is important that the Senate should be in session to meet that condition of things to-day and to-morrow. Otherwise, you will be kept in session a week or ten days later than you otherwise would be kept if you do not now retain your seats and act upon acceptable nominations that will be sent to you. I think there is no doubt of that proposition.

Mr. SUMNER. This discussion whether we shall adjourn over has taken a wide range. Nobody can doubt that the President failed in his duty when he postponed sending in those nominations to the last hours of the session; but because the President failed in his duty that is no reason why the Senate should fail in theirs. We must act on the nominations when they are sent to us. That is our constitutional duty. We must act on them at least so far as we can, as is consistent with our ability and, if I may so say, our physical powers. I believe all will agree that the Senate did all that it could do before the clock sounded its last moment. It seems to me, therefore, that should not be introduced at this moment as any reason why we should adjourn over or should not adjourn over. That question is to be met with reference to existing business.

I should say nothing more on this head but for the remark that fell from the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] I am sorry that he made that remark, because I think it will go forth to the country and give an idea that we are about to adjourn at once, Monday, if you please, or immediately, leaving the vast concerns of this Republic which now crave your attention unattended to. There are interests on which we must act—so I humbly submit to the Senate—before we go home; and I hope that the Senator from Rhode Island will join with us and press action upon those great interests.

Mr. ANTHONY. The House has voted to adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. He says the House has voted to adjourn. When?

Mr. ANTHONY. From Monday until next May.

Mr. SUMNER. Is not that resolution lying on our table? There has been no action on it on our part, and I do not understand there is any purpose to act upon it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator must admit there is a reasonable probability of our adjourning pretty soon when the House has voted to adjourn and the resolution is now before us; at least a reasonable possibility.

Mr. SUMNER. I am inclined to think that the House is reconsidering its course on that now, though perhaps the Senator has information that I have not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have understood it is reconsidering its course with a view to extending the time of adjournment until late in the fall.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not understood it so. The Senator has information that has not reached me. I should regret any adjournment at this time until we have acted on the business before us. It seems to me that we must give protection to our fellow-citizens in the South before we go home. But I will not go into that question now merely on a motion to adjourn over. At some other time perhaps it will be more proper to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next; and on this question a division has been called.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 10, nays 21.

Mr. RAMSEY. I voted under a mistake. I am desirous of adjourning over.

Mr. CONNESS. No matter; it will not change the result.

PRINTING OF VETO OF RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed that by an error probably, or an oversight, there was no order made to print the message of the President of the United States giving his reasons for not approving the military government bill. I will ask that an order be made that it be printed for the use of the Senate. I wish a copy myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made unless objected to. The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) relative to claims of certain northern creditors, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 31) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States,'" approved March 21, 1866.

HOUSE RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) relative to claims of certain northern creditors was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 8, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] pending at the adjournment yesterday, to suspend the rules to permit the introduction of a joint resolution authorizing the application of part of the funds now in the Treasury to the redemption of compound-interest notes now outstanding.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENT IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, asking Congress for an appropriation of money to improve the harbor at the mouth of the Kalamazoo river in that State; which were ordered to be referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed, and also ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—DELANO VS. MORGAN.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Columbus Delano, who contests the right of Hon. George W. Morgan to a seat in this House as a Representative from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio, praying for an extension of time for taking testimony, submit a report accompanied with a resolution.

The report and resolution were read, as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Columbus Delano, who contests the right of Hon. George W. Morgan to a seat in this House, as a Representative from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio, praying for an extension of time for taking testimony, submit the following report:

That they have heard the parties, and for the reasons set forth in the memorial, which is herewith submitted, and for the further reason that the sitting member consents thereto, they recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the matter of the contested election in the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio, the time for taking testimony is hereby extended to each party for the period of seventy-five days from and after the passage of this resolution, said testimony to be taken in all other respects in conformity with existing law.

The resolution was agreed to, and the report was ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—STEWART VS. PHELPS.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the memorial and accompanying papers of Joseph J. Stewart, who contests the right of Hon. Charles E. Phelps to a seat in this House, as a Representative from the third congressional district of Maryland, have instructed me to submit a report, accompanied with the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the matter of the contested election in the third congressional district of Maryland, the time for taking testimony is hereby extended to each party for the period of sixty days from and after the passage of this resolution, said testimony to be taken in all respects in conformity with existing law, except that the same may be taken before a justice of the peace in said district.

The resolution was agreed to, and the report ordered to be printed.

SYMPATHY FOR IRELAND.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House extends its sympathy to the people of Ireland in their pending struggle for constitutional liberty. If the despotic Governments of Europe shall be allowed to establish monarchical institutions in America, so should the United States foster and promote the extension of republican institutions to Europe.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. WOOD. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. A motion is already pending to suspend the rules, being made at the adjournment last evening; and there cannot be two pending at the same time.

Mr. WOOD. Then I give notice that I shall introduce the resolution hereafter.

COMPOUND-INTEREST NOTES.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order.

The House accordingly resumed the regular order, being the motion pending at the adjournment yesterday to suspend the rules to allow the introduction of a joint resolution for the application of part of the fund in the Treasury for the redemption of compound-interest notes.

Mr. PRICE. I presume there is no objection to the introduction of this resolution this morning.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I object.

Mr. PRICE. I hope the House will suspend the rules.

The question being put on suspending the rules, there were—ayes thirty-one.

Mr. PRICE. I call for tellers; and pending that I ask leave to occupy five minutes in explanation of this resolution.

Mr. ELIOT and Mr. EGGLESTON objected.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. PRICE and EGGLESTON.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 36.

So (two thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. ELIOT.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for five days for Mr. BROOMALL, on account of sickness.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, it was ordered that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been called for, the first business in order is the call of the committees for reports.

The committees were called, but no reports were made.

The SPEAKER. There being no reports of committees, the morning hour has now expired.

PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. BANKS. I move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the first business on the Speaker's table, being Senate joint resolution No 2, supplementary to other joint resolutions to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1887; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read. It provides:

1. That the commission of the United States at the Universal Exhibition to be held at Paris in the year 1887 shall consist of the commissioner general and honorary commissioner, whose appointment was approved by the joint resolution of January 22, 1866; also of the thirty commissioners whose appointment was provided for by the joint resolution of July 5, 1866, and of twenty commissioners whose appointment is hereinafter provided for.

2. That the commissioner general shall be the president of the commission thus constituted, with a vote on all questions that may arise.

3. That the commission shall meet at Paris as early as possible before the opening of the Exhibition, upon the call of the commissioner general, and, when properly organized, shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for efficient action, with power to elect a vice president from their own number, who, in the absence of the commissioner general, shall preside at all meetings of the commission, and to appoint committees and chairmen of groups.

4. That the commission may designate additional persons, not exceeding twenty in number, being citizens of the United States, known to be skilled in any branch of industry or art, who are hereby authorized to attend the Exhibition in behalf of the United States as honorary commissioners, without compensation.

5. That the commission may employ a secretary and clerks for the commission, the necessary scientific assistants, and draughtsmen, and may engage suitable rooms for the commission.

6. That no commissioner shall act as agent for the show or sale of any article at the Exhibition, or be interested, directly or indirectly, in any profits from any such article.

Section two provides that $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes specified, be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for additional freights from New York to Havre; for transportation from Havre to Paris; for return freight of articles owned by the United States or lent to the Government by individuals; for marine and fire insurance on the articles thus lent; for additional steam-power at Paris in the "palace" and the "annex," or supplemental building, and in grounds adjacent; for the exhibition of machines, agricultural and other, and for the erection of buildings to illustrate the education and agriculture of the United States; and for the collection of specimens of agricultural productions under joint resolution for that purpose; and for the necessary expense of collecting, classifying, labeling, and packing mineralogical and metallurgical specimens, to complete the exhibition of the mineral wealth of the United States; for the necessary expense of laborers and extra services in the offices at Paris and New York; for the expenses of a secretary, clerks, scientific assistants, and draughtsmen, rooms, and other incidental expenses of the commission.

The third section provides that it shall be the duty of the general agent at New York and of the commissioner general at Paris to transmit to Congress, through the Department of State, a detailed statement of the manner in which the expenditures herein authorized are made by them respectively.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is precisely as it passed the House at the close of the last session by more than a two-thirds vote. It is well understood by members, and I trust the question may be taken without delay. If there be no explanation required I will ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to know whether this joint resolution does not contain an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution has passed to a stage at which that question cannot be raised.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move that the joint resolution be laid upon the table; and I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the joint resolution upon the table.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. MUNGEN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was joint resolution of the Senate No. 6, extending the time for the completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask that the joint resolution be considered now.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like some explanation in regard to it.

Mr. CHANLER. Does not this joint resolution contain an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is not this the same resolution that was before the House during the last Congress?

The SPEAKER. The resolution merely provides for the extension of time for the completion of a public work in Wisconsin. It is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If it is the same one that was before the last Congress there is a great deal of objection to it.

Mr. SAWYER. The bill to which the gentleman from Illinois has reference was an entirely different one, and had no connection at all with this.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Bills of this kind, referring to some past act which they propose to continue in force, cannot be understood without some explanation of their meaning. This kind of legislation frequently slips through Congress and very few members understand it, because they are not familiar with the acts referred to. I therefore desire to have some information in reference to this matter.

Mr. JULIAN. This is a matter which is entirely local. The measure has the unanimous approval of the Wisconsin delegation.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state for the information of the House that this resolution simply extends the time for the completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers and the construction of a canal. The money needed for the completion of the work is deposited in the State treasury of our State, and this resolution simply extends the time for the completion of the work. Such an extension of time is necessary. The resolution involves no appropriation, either of land or of money, and it is satisfactory to the people of Wisconsin and also to their delegation here.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Has the time expired during which this improvement is to be made?

Mr. HOPKINS. It has.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. How much money is there in the State treasury for this purpose?

Mr. HOPKINS. Seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Would not that money be returned to the United States Government in case of the forfeiture of the conditions by the State? I will call, however, for the reading of the resolution again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. EGGLESTON. This matter was before the Committee of Commerce of the last House when they were considering the river and harbor improvement bill, and an appropriation was included in that bill for one of these rivers. Now, for the purpose of obtaining full information upon this subject, I move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

Mr. PRUYN. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EGGLESTON,] if agreed to by this House, must necessarily delay action on this matter a long time; I therefore trust that the proposed reference will not be made. I have entire confidence in the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOPKINS,] and believe that this joint resolution should pass. The improvement in question is a meritorious one, and Congress should aid it by every means of this kind in its power. No money is asked for; no land is asked for; it is simply a question of extension of time for the completion of a project which has already been declared to be a meritorious one. I trust this motion for delay will not meet the approval of the House.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask if the passage of this joint resolution would not tie up the public domain for five years from actual settlement? It appears to me that it would.

The question was on the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Commerce when appointed.

Mr. SAWYER. I hope this joint resolution will not be referred, because there is no reason in the world why it should be. This company has already expended about half a million dollars in this work, and they have until the 3d day of August next in which to complete it. They have deposited in the State treasury of Wisconsin the sum of $70,000 to secure the completion of the work. Some difficulty has arisen in regard to whether the improvement shall be carried out so as to require larger locks than those which they agreed to make originally. If this resolution does not pass, then the company will go on and complete the work with small locks, as they originally agreed to do; but if it is passed, then they will have ample time in which to determine whether to make larger locks or not. The appropriation already made for the improvement of the Wisconsin river will not be worth much without the enlarged locks, which will be secured by the passage of this joint resolution. This matter was thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Public Lands of the last House, and there it met with approval; but the committee were unable to get the floor to make their report.

Mr. JULIAN. This measure has been carefully considered by two standing committees of Congress, and unanimously concurred in by both committees. I hope, therefore, the motion to refer will not prevail.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. With the explanation of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER,] I can see no objection to the passage of this joint resolution.

The motion to refer was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATIONERY AND NEWSPAPERS FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster of this House be, and he is hereby, required to deliver to each member and Delegate stationery equal in amount to that provided for members during a short session; and that the Clerk of the House furnish each member and Delegate with the same amount of newspapers received by the members and Delegates of the last House.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEBTS CONFISCATED BY REBELS.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution relating to certain claims of northern creditors; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. The preamble recites that the congress of the confederate States ordered the sequestration and confiscation of all the debts due from inhabitants of the southern States to their creditors residing in the loyal States; that there was paid to the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, prior to the 1st day of May, 1862, a sum exceeding half a million dollars, the proceeds of such confiscation of northern credits, of which there remained to the credit of the confederate States receivers in such bank the sum of $219,090 94 only on the 1st day of May, at the time of the occupation of the city of New Orleans by the forces of the United States, which said sum, by the order of the general then commanding the Department of the Gulf, was seized for the benefit of the northern creditors whose debts had been thus confiscated, and said sum was sent by him to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to be by him held in trust for the benefit of said northern creditors; that owing to a doubt entertained by the Secretary of the Treasury as to his legal authority to distribute the said sum of $219,090 94 among the creditors to whom it belongs, and to determine the rights of each to his portion thereof, the money has lain undisturbed in the Treasury since July, 1862, to the great injury and detriment of the just and loyal owners of the money, although they have made many applications to have the same.

The joint resolution, therefore, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a commission of three persons, one of whom shall be learned in the law, to hear and determine the claims of the parties who are entitled to the said sum of $219,090 94, ratably among the persons who shall present their claims and be entitled thereto, to an amount not exceeding the claim of each when confiscated, with interest thereon. But no claim which shall not be presented within three months after public notice of a meeting of the commissioners to receive such claim is to be allowed or paid by order of the commissioners.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was introduced, and read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. If the resolution is to be debated, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as entitled to the floor, he having introduced the resolution.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me a moment.

Mr. BUTLER. I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It has occurred to me, in hearing this resolution read, that northern creditors have their claims against their southern debtors the same now as formerly. The act of sequestration passed by the congress of the confederate States would be treated as null and void; and those creditors can collect their claims without regard to the payments which were made into the treasury of the confederacy. The fund thus seized by the Government of the United States was property of the confederacy, and being captured became the property of the United States; and it ought, it seems to me, to go into the common fund of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, this fund which was found in the Citizens' bank of New Orleans, stood in such a condition as to be separated from the general fund of the confederate States. The general then commanding the Department of the Gulf sent this particular fund to the United States Treasury in trust for the creditors. He sent also a quarter of a million dollars of the general funds of the confederacy to go into the common Treasury of the United States. This particular fund has been kept intact by the Secretary of the Treasury ever since; and it ought to go to these northern creditors.

I agree with my friend on the left [Mr. SCOFIELD] that the northern creditor has his legal remedy against the southern debtor, although the latter may already have paid the money under the void sequestration and confiscation orders of the confederate States; but in view of the lapse of time and the devastations of the war, that remedy would, I fear, in most cases prove fruitless. Therefore, after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, I have ventured to ask Congress to allow this fund, under his direction, to be distributed to those to whom it justly belongs. It does not in my judgment belong to the Treasury of the United States. It was not confederate property, because it had not passed into the general fund of the confederacy. It had not been so appropriated when taken possession of on the part of the Government.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] what effect such a law as this will have so far as regards releasing those debtors? Will it afford them a defense in a court of law if they be sued by their various creditors? If this bill be enacted into a law, and these creditors receive their respective portions of this fund in payment of their claims, will the debtors be released? Can they plead this payment in bar of an action against them by the creditors?

I wish to suggest one other point. Of course all the debtors in the South did not pay their money into the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans; a great many of them paid nothing. Now, suppose A at the South, who owed B at the North, paid nothing into the Citizens' Bank; and suppose that B should go to the Secretary of the Treasury under this commission and receive his distributive or pro rata share. What will be the effect of such an enactment as this in such a case? Can B, having received a part or all of his money from the Treasury, sue A either for the balance or for the whole debt? It strikes me that a measure of this sort had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask another question in this same connection, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will allow me.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know whether the passage of this resolution will not in effect recognize the validity of the confiscation by the confederate government? If we now take this fund and apply it in payment of debts which were confiscated by order of the confederate government, will it not be in effect a recognition of the authority of that government so to confiscate and so to appropriate the debts of northern creditors?

Mr. BUTLER. I will answer the last gentleman first. The resolution proceeds upon the proposition that all that was done by the confederate government was null and void, and that certain moneys which ought to have been paid to northern creditors were paid to confederate State receivers. The northern creditors are now seeking in this manner to pursue their claims to this fund which went to diminish debtors' ability to meet their demands, and in no event (and I have endeavored to consider the question with care and attention) will the passage of this resolution be a recognition of the confederate State government.

In answer to my friend on my right, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] I would say that this resolution only provides that this fund shall be distributed to those identical creditors whose debts were thus attempted to be confiscated. It does not affect anybody else on earth, and it affects the southern debtor only in this: that so much as his northern creditor gets by this process he cannot ask again. He may bring his suit for any balance. Indeed, I do not know but what he might bring his suit for all, and it will be for the southern debtor to show that some satisfaction has been received by the creditor.

There are from one half to three fourths of a million dollars of these debts. There is only $219,000 to meet them; therefore it requires a commission to distribute the fund pro rata. After these northern creditors have waited for five years and upward it seems to me that some remedy should be afforded them by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether I understood him correctly in saying that this resolution meets the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BUTLER. Entirely, sir. He would have acted in the matter himself but he doubted the power.

Mr. RAUM. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I will hear it read.

Mr. RAUM. I desire to amend the resolution by adding the following:

Provided, That the cost of said commission shall be paid out of said money.

Mr. BUTLER. I accept the amendment.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House all information in the War Department, and particularly such as may be in the possession of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, relative to property seized or taken possession of by the Government or its agents in the State of Louisiana; and that there be embraced in said report the kind of property, whether abandoned or confiscated, names of the reputed owners, date of seizure, assessment, value, amount of profits received from rents or otherwise, what amount of such property has been restored to said reputed owners, when the same was restored, by whom, and upon whose order; and also all the papers in the case of Duncan F. Kenner and J. W. Zachary.

The resolution, being a call for executive information, was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LOWER CALIFORNIA COMPANY.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask leave to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas a number of American citizens associated together under the title of the Lower California Company have acquired from the republican Government of Mexico a grant of land and privileges in Lower California, embracing nearly the whole of said peninsula; and whereas said company has recently employed at great expense a large party of scientific and competent persons to make a complete survey of the interior of the territory so granted; and whereas such survey, though made by the said company in their own interest, springs from a large public spirit and is made likewise in the interest of general civilization, and largely in the interest of the United States; and whereas we have no reliable information on the authority of any public survey that has ever been obtained by the Government of the United States, of the coast and islands of that important continentary territory: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to detach some suitable vessel now in the Pacific for the purpose of making a continentary marine survey of the coast of Lower California and adjacent islands, and report the information so obtained to the Navy Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

SURPLUS GOLD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask leave to offer a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the surplus gold and receive legal-tenders at par for duties, &c.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not propose to have it considered now, but I desire to have it printed.

No objection being made, it was ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to vote for a measure to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

SYMPATHY FOR IRELAND.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House extends its sympathy to the people of Ireland in their pending struggle for constitutional liberty. If the despotic Governments of Europe shall be allowed to establish monarchical institutions in America so should the United States foster and promote the extension of republican institutions to Europe.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. WOOD. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. Would it be in order to move to refer this resolution to a committee.

The SPEAKER. It would not. The motion is to suspend the rules to enable the resolution to be considered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 14, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Brownell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravelly, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hayes, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Phelps, Pile, Polsley, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Seefeldt, Shanks, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Twitchell, Upson, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Blair, Broomall, Cake, Covode, Cullom, Driggs, Garfield, Ladin, Noell, Shellabarger, Trowbridge, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Windom—14.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Barnes, Blaine, Butler, Cook, Cornell, Denison, Dodge, Eliot, Finney, Griswold, Hamilton, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hulburt, Kelley, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Morrell, Newcomb, Nicholson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Randall, Schenck, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—42.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was received.

Mr. WOOD. I ask the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I would ask the gentleman from New York to allow me to make a motion to refer this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when appointed, and I give him notice that, if he will do so, I will submit a resolution for the immediate appointment of that committee as soon as I can obtain the floor for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD. I regret that I cannot assent to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. This is a resolution expressive of a single sentiment, and I think the House is in a condition to adopt it now, and I therefore ask for its adoption.

Mr. BANKS. Let me say a word.

Mr. WOOD. I wish the gentleman would make his proposition a little more distinctly.

Mr. BANKS. I will send to the Chair to be read for the information of the House, with the leave of the gentleman from New York, a resolution which I propose to offer for adoption when I get an opportunity.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in view of events transpiring on the northern frontier of the United States, it is expedient that the standing Committee of Foreign Affairs should be now appointed by the Speaker for the purpose of considering the foreign relations of the United States.

Mr. WOOD. I cannot see the connection of that resolution with the one I have offered, I will vote with a great deal of pleasure for the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] when it shall be properly before the House for consideration; but I desire a vote on my resolution, and therefore I call the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. The latter part of the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] refers expressly to the movements for a confederation on the northern frontier of the United States. It is proper that in reference to that matter the subject should at least be considered by a committee. Inasmuch as there can be no delay upon this question, I trust the gentleman will allow his resolution to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Or if he insists upon the call for the previous question, I trust the House will not second it, but that the resolution will be referred.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether this resolution is divisible, so that we may take a vote upon the first part of it in regard to extending sympathy to Ireland?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is divisible. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has so written his resolution that each proposition contained in it can be voted upon separately, and each may stand by itself if the other is voted down.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I give notice that if it shall come to a vote upon adopting this resolution I shall ask for a division of the resolution.

Mr. WOOD. I shall not object to that.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division there were—yeas 33, nays 86.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BANKS. I now move that the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when appointed.

Mr. WOOD. I would have no objection to referring the latter clause of my resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when appointed; but I desire to have a direct vote of the House upon the first proposition.

Mr. STEVENS. Let the whole be referred.

Mr. BANKS. I do not suppose there is a member in this House who does not feel the same sympathy with Ireland that the gentleman from New York does. But inasmuch as he has coupled that expression of sympathy with another question affecting all the interests of this country, I think the whole matter should be fully considered by a committee; and if my motion to refer shall be agreed to by the House, I will then ask the adoption of a resolution for the immediate appointment of the Committee of Foreign Affairs. I now call the previous question on my motion to refer.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. JUDD. Is it in order now to call for the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is not during the operation of the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and there were—yeas twenty-two.

Before the yeas were counted,

Mr. CHANLER called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BANKS and WOOD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—yeas twenty-seven.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 40, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Julian, Ketcham, Kit-chen, Koontz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Seefeldt, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Butler, Chanler, Denison, Donnelly, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Harding, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Judd, Kerr, William Lawrence, Logan, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—40.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Barnes, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kelley, Kelsey, Loughbridge, Newcomb, Pike, Pile, Price, Randall, Sawyer, Selye, Sitgreaves, Taylor, Van Aernam, and Thomas Williams—23.

So the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. I now ask leave to introduce a resolution, the purport of which I have already indicated.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to yield to me for a moment that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I will do so.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDonald, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States," approved March 21, 1866, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had appointed Messrs. FESSENDEN, SHERMAN, and BUCKALEW the members on its part of the joint select Committee to Revise and Equalize the Pay of the Employés of both Houses of Congress.

The message further announced that the Senate had appointed Messrs. EDMUNDS, WILLIAMS, and BUCKALEW the members on its part of the joint select Committee on Retrenchment.

COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to introduce a concurrent resolution for the purpose of continuing the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE and others objected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules to permit the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLSON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 50, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Coker, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Hunter, Julian, Kitchen, Kountz, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Lynch, McCarthy, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Taffe, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Dawes, Denison, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Judd, Kerr, Ketcham, Leflin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Prunty, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, and Wood—50.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Chanler, Eggleston, Finney, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kelley, Kelsey, McClurg, Newcomb, Pike, Randall, Selye, Stevens, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Twitchell, Van Aernam, Van Auken, and Henry D. Washburn—23.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BANKS resumed the floor.

NATIONAL MILITARY AND NAVAL ASYLUM.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for a few moments. There has just come over from the Senate a bill requiring immediate action.

Mr. BANKS. I will yield if it will not consume much time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief explanation in reference to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Ohio making a brief explanation?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the bill which I desire the House to consider at this time is "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States, approved March 21, 1866.'" In the present organization of this national asylum, the board of managers consists of twelve persons, the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the United States, and the Secretary of War being members ex officio of this board. The nine others are divided into three classes, one third being elected every three years by the Senate and House of Representatives. Seven members of the board are required to constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. Now, there is in the law a provision that no member of Congress shall be eligible to election as a member of this board. This was found inconvenient in practice; and in consequence of the president of the board, General BUTLER, having been elected a member of Congress, the House, some three or four weeks ago, passed a bill removing this disqualification of members of Congress. The Senate at that time refused to pass the bill, which met with no opposition in this House.

But now the Senate has sent to the House a similar bill taking away that disqualification of members of Congress. The occasion of it is one of great emergency. The board are now assembled here in Washington, pursuant to notice. Many members of it are present for the purpose of holding their regular meetings and transacting business of great importance. The President of the United States cannot be expected to attend. The Chief Justice and Secretary of War are in attendance at some inconvenience. There are four other members of the board. A quorum cannot be obtained as long as General BUTLER, who is a member of the board, is disqualified. The consequence is, no business can be done, and the board is brought to a dead lock. The Senate has passed this bill to remedy the difficulty by removing this disqualification.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire if the gentleman does not think we can procure competent men outside of Congress for the duties?

Mr. SCHENCK. Beyond all question. But the difficulty is the board is brought to a standstill, and I suppose it is not in any proper sense a disqualification to be a member of Congress. I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. Ross] would be a most excellent member of this board, notwithstanding his occupying a seat here. It is provided in the law—and that is not interfered with by this bill—that no two members shall be from the same State. Three members are elected every three years, and the term of service is nine years.

Without detaining the House any longer I ask that the bill may be now put on its passage, because without this action of Congress the board cannot get along with their business, being only able to get six members together, whereas it takes seven to constitute a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for information, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The bill was read. It simply amends the act of March 21, 1866, by striking out the words "not members of Congress."

No objection being made, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the House will now act on the resolution which I have sent to the Chair.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of events transpiring on the northern frontier of the United States, it is expedient that the standing Committee on Foreign Affairs should be now appointed by the Speaker, for the purpose of considering the foreign relations of the United States.

Mr. BANKS. The reason I assign for offering this resolution at the present time is the fact that during the month of February a bill passed to a second reading in the House of Lords providing for a confederation of the British Provinces, and contemplating the foundation of a State or an empire that may hereafter surpass in power that of England, and equal that of the United States, or, as was said by its mover "be second only to that of Russia."

The Legislature of Maine, most interested in this movement, has, through its Committee on Federal Relations, made a report adversely to this project and presented resolutions on the subject, which I shall ask the Clerk to read. The stage through which the bill just alluded to has passed in the House of Lords is the most important of any parliamentary stage that it has to encounter, inasmuch as all its fundamental principles are under consideration. I cannot doubt that the people of this country will look with intense solicitude upon the progress of this movement on the part of the British Provinces contemplating as it does the establishment of an empire founded upon monarchical principles so near to us as to influence public opinion, and which cannot but have in the future a material if not a controlling influence over the affairs of the American Government.

I send to the Chair the concluding paragraph of the report and resolutions submitted to the Legislature of Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

"We would do nothing to accelerate the progress of political opinion throughout British North America. Republican institutions should never be assumed by any people until the whole population has been inured to habits of self-government and thoroughly imbued with the principle of implicit obedience to law, whenever that law is the declared will of a majority. Hence we discard all thoughts of the annexation of the North American Provinces to this Republic, and cheerfully await the matured wishes of our neighbors. If the advantages, commercial and social, which shall follow their union with the Republic are less in their estimation than the corresponding burdens of greatly increased taxation and the instability of Administrations, they must enjoy without interference on our part that form of government most congenial to the tastes, habits, and interests of their people, in the assurance that nothing but friendly relations can grow out of the existing state of things. They can never be involved in a war with us unless it is forced upon them by the circumstances of their political condition."

In view of these facts the committee report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the Imperial Government of Great Britain to establish monarchical government in North America, or to place a vice royalty by act of Parliament over her several North American Provinces, would be an implied infraction of those principles of government which this nation has assumed to maintain upon this continent.

Resolved, That the people of Maine, deeply interested in the preservation of peace and of friendly relations with the people of British North America, respectfully appeal to the United States Government to interpose its legitimate influence in friendly and earnest remonstrance with the British Government against establishing any system of government in North America the influence of which would endanger the friendly relations of the people of the British Provinces with the people of the United States.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing report and resolves to the President of the United States and to each House of Congress."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] that this seems to me to be rather an inopportune time for us to be protesting against the establishment of an empire upon this continent after we have just placed under military rule and under despotism ten of our own States. It seems to me, sir, that our remonstrance would have much more force and effect if we should wait to make it until the Republic is restored and until the States are relieved from the despotic rule which the last Congress imposed upon them.

I think, sir, that it would have more moral power and influence if we wait for the time when these States can be relieved from the operation of the despotic rule which we have established over them.

Mr. BANKS. Allow me to say that the object of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] for which the gentleman from Wisconsin voted, was to accomplish the purposes which he now desires, and that is the early restoration of the States of the Union to their full privileges, so far as consistent with the safety of the Government.

But, sir, it is not intended to present at this time any protest against the confederation of the British Provinces. The resolutions which I have had read from the State of Maine were read merely for information. All I ask is that a committee shall be appointed to which any instructions in reference to this matter may be given by the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I would inquire of the gentleman, as the former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whether the only action which is at all possible to be contemplated, if this committee is appointed, will not be merely a protest. Does the gentleman contemplate as within the realms of possibility that this Congress at this session can do anything more than that, even if as much?

Mr. BANKS. I do not contemplate any positive action; all I ask is the appointment of the committee, so that there may be some agency through which the House can act upon this question.

Mr. BLAINE. It must be apparent to the members of this House that there is no greater exigency for the appointment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs than there is for the appointment of any other committee, and it seems to me that if the House votes now to appoint the Committee on Foreign Affairs we might just as well adopt a resolution to appoint all the standing committees. I am not aware that the gentleman contemplates any such decisive action as would engage the attention of a standing committee of the House. This matter certainly cannot go beyond a mere protest, and if we are to appoint this committee it seems to me we might as well appoint all the standing committees of the House.

The resolutions of the State of Maine which have been read, and to which the attention of the House has been called, do not contemplate any positive action. They contemplate merely a respectful protest, and I see no reason why we should appoint this committee now, and I hope the motion of the gentleman will not prevail.

Mr. BANKS. It is not impossible that within a few weeks Congress may adjourn until October or even until November. This question of confederation affects not alone the interests of the British Provinces, but ours also, and it is certainly proper that its effect upon the interests of this country should be considered, or at least that we should have an organized committee that shall have power to consider its bearing upon our interests, whether it be for the purpose of making a protest or for more decided action. It is necessary that we should ascertain the full effect of this measure when consummated and that it should be understood. I ask the previous question.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman to allow me to move to amend his resolution so as to provide for the appointment of all the committees.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that purpose.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. BANKS's resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) for the relief of the freedmen or destitute colored people of the District of Columbia.

DUTIES ON HAWAIIAN VESSELS.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to authorize the refunding of discriminating duties exacted upon merchandise imported into the Hawaiian Islands; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or refund all duties which have been assessed since the 1st day of January, 1865, on Hawaiian vessels and their cargoes, beyond the amount which would have been payable on vessels of the United States and their cargoes.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] will give the House some explanation of this joint resolution, and the necessity for its passage at this time.

Mr. ELIOT. In 1824 Congress passed a law authorizing the President of the United States, by proclamation, to permit the vessels of any foreign country to enter into the ports of this country with their cargoes without the payment of any duties, whenever that foreign country made the same provision in regard to vessels and cargoes from the United States.

In 1828 Congress passed a law additional to that of 1824, and enlarging somewhat its provisions. The Hawaiian Government has never discriminated at all against the vessels of the United States. But no official notice of that fact was given to the Government of the United States until December, 1866; at which time, by a proclamation of the President, the laws which had been passed theretofore were extended to cover the vessels and cargoes from the Hawaiian Islands.

But there have been two or three cases where duties have been assessed and exacted upon Hawaiian vessels, because of the fact that the Department had not official knowledge of the exemption of American vessels and cargoes by the Hawaiian Government. Application is now made for the remission of those duties in accordance with the previous law. I am informed that there have been but two or three such cases; and the whole extent of this joint resolution is to permit the duties exacted in those cases to be refunded. The amount in one case is about five thousand dollars; in another case it is about two thousand four hundred; at least such is the information given to me by the Department.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. JUDD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of States for resolutions, beginning with the State of Pennsylvania, where the call last rested. The pending question is upon a resolution submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] upon which he has called for the previous question. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the tariff bill, being House bill No. 718 of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, together with the pending amendments, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the call for the previous question should not be seconded, and any member rises to debate the resolution, it will go over under the rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] if it is his intention to follow up this resolution with another requiring the immediate appointment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MOORHEAD. It is not. I would say—

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object to debate.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I would inquire if the gentleman from Pennsylvania would withdraw his call for the previous question and allow me to offer an amendment to his resolution?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] is entitled to the floor unless he surrenders it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Could not the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to allow me to introduce a bill for consideration at the present time?

The SPEAKER. If no gentleman objects. Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. CHANLER. I would inquire of the Chair if there is any necessity for action upon the bill to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] refers in his resolution, now that we have passed a bill in relation to the tariff on wool?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question for the Chair to answer.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I insist upon my call for the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now make the motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion to adjourn, the Chair asks consent to lay before the House some executive communications and other documents.

There was no objection.

ELECTION CONTEST—BIRCH VS. VAN HORN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Birch vs. Van Horn, from the sixth district of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR SHAWNEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimates of appropriation for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Shawnees; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS REVENUE LAW.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the draft of a general customs revenue law, prepared in compliance with the resolution of June 26, 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH that the House adjourn, there were—yeas 70, noes 22.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House thereupon (at two o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) adjourned till Monday next.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. EGLESTON: The petition of John Graham and 50 others, citizens of the United States, praying for a charter to build a railroad from the city of Washington to Cincinnati, Ohio.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 9, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. JACOB M. HOWARD, of Michigan, appeared in his seat to-day.

ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the report of the proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences during the year 1866.

Mr. WILSON presented the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of the National Academy of Sciences for 1866, in addition to the usual number, one thousand extra copies for the use of the Academy.

ALEXANDRIA ELECTION.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I have been requested to present a petition of officers and citizens of Alexandria who were here yesterday, asking that action may not be taken on the joint resolution declaring the municipal offices vacant until they can be heard in opposition to it. I believe they design presenting a more extended petition which will be ready on Monday. I believe the resolution referred to is now on the table. I ask, therefore, that this petition be read and laid upon the table.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of Alexandria, Virginia, beg leave to present as their request, on behalf of the people of their city, that your honorable bodies will delay action upon the joint resolution concerning the election held in the said city on March 5, 1867, until your petitioners and the citizens of Alexandria, generally can make known to your honorable bodies by extended petitions and other apt means, as shall to your honorable bodies seem meet, that the constituted authorities of Alexandria did not desire or presume to defy the laws of the United States, or maliciously and intentionally deprive any portion of our population of any right or franchise which they might possess under the laws of the land, and that if errors were committed they were unintentional and the result of improper construction rather than malicious purpose. We ask your honorable bodies to take the willingness of our people to correct any errors which may have been committed as the evidence of their purpose and desire to conform to the laws which are passed for their government.

HUGH LATHAM, Mayor;
GEORGE BRYAN,
President Board of Aldermen;
JOHN B. SMOOT,
President Common Council;
GEORGE T. WHITTINGTON,
JOHN J. JAMIESON,
GILBERT S. MINER,
G. R. BLACKLOCK,
ALBERT STUART,
D. L. SMOOT.

Mr. WILSON. Before the petition goes upon the table, I desire to say a word. When the intelligence arrived here that the city authorities of Alexandria had refused to comply with the law of the country, and had refused to receive the votes of the colored portion of the citizens, I submitted the joint resolution to which this petition refers. Yesterday a committee from Alexandria, headed by the mayor and other persons of character and influence there, called on me here in the Senate and stated that they had no idea or intention of setting aside the laws of the United States or of disobeying those laws. The military government law had not been officially published; the appointment of a commanding general for the district, under that law, had not been made; and they did not think that law applied to their recent election; but they said that at any future election they would receive those votes and treat them the same as any others; they would certainly do so at the May election, when it shall come off. Their action at the last election they said was not with any intention of disobeying the law. After this explanation I did not call up the joint resolution, as I had intended to do.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I was called out yesterday, and had about five minutes conversation with these gentlemen, with only one or two of whom had I any previous personal acquaintance, and their remarks to me were similar to those stated by the Senator from Massachusetts as having been made to him. I saw in the papers last evening that they had called on the Attorney General of the United States as to the course they should pursue, and that officer had declined to give an opinion in the short time allowed, but had incidentally expressed the opinion that they would not be under the military bill until military possession was taken of the State. They said they were entirely willing the election should be set aside, and another one held in conformity to the principles of the military bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have been brought perhaps more directly in communication with these gentlemen than either of the honorable members who have spoken. Their statement to me was that they had consulted all the professional gentlemen of Alexandria upon the question as to the right of the blacks to vote, and they had all given an opinion that they had no such right; there was no law to authorize their voting at that time. Not being satisfied with that they came to Washington and applied to the Attorney General to give an opinion, and he stated that his engagements were such that it was impossible for him then to examine the question. The exclusion of the blacks from voting was therefore, on their part, because they were advised by persons in whom they had every right to confide that they were not entitled to vote at that election. They expressed to me, as they did to both the Senators who have spoken, their fixed determination to carry out to the very letter the legislation which Congress had adopted on the subject.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers in the cases of Parker Quince, George Ashley, and Anna M. Robaldo, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Norman Ward be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to commercial reciprocity between the United States and the Sandwich Islands be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That Walter F. Halleck have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred a memorial of officers of the twenty-first regiment New York cavalry, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) for the relief of Daniel Ellis, and a joint resolution (S. R. No. 9) in favor of A. W. Walker, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

INDIAN COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country, to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $20,000 to pay the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 2) to authorize the refunding of discriminating duties upon merchandise imported in Hawaiian vessels, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

DESTITUTION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a communication from the War Department, transmitting one from the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau respecting the want, and danger of starvation, in several of the southern States, have instructed me to report a joint resolution, and I ask for its present consideration. It ought to be voted on promptly, if at all.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States; was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to empower and direct the Secretary of War to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want among all classes of the people in those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned wide-spread destitution; the issues are to be made through the Freedmen's Bureau under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. One million dollars is appropriated for the purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I send to the desk the letter of General Howard, and I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS, WASHINGTON, March 8, 1867.

Sir: In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the United States I have the honor to report as follows:

From official sources, and confirmed by gentlemen from different sections of the South, my estimate is thirty-two thousand six hundred and sixty-two whites, and twenty-four thousand two hundred and thirty-eight colored people, making in all fifty-six thousand nine hundred who will need food from some source before the next crop can relieve them. The number of rations for all per month, one million seven hundred and seven thousand. For five months, the probable time required, eight million five hundred and thirty-five thousand rations, at twenty-five cents per ration, the estimated cost, will be $2,133,750. Of this sum an appropriation has already been made for the five months to the amount of $625,000, leaving an additional sum required of $1,508,750. This sum I deem sufficient to meet the extreme want occasioned by failure of the crop, and other causes referred to in the resolution of inquiry. The present appropriation is ample, provided the issues be confined to the classes named in the Freedmen's Bureau act; but the additional sum named will be required should the issue be extended as contemplated in the foregoing estimate.

The following table affords the detail of the estimate for the several States where want is reported to exist.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. O. HOWARD,

Maj. Gen., Commissioner Bureau of Refugees, &c.
Hon. B. F. WADE, President of the Senate.

P. S. Since my report was drawn up I received a joint estimate from the assistant commissioner and Governor of Georgia greatly exceeding the amount in the table. I am, however, unwilling to recommend a larger appropriation for Georgia before another estimate shall be made based on a thorough inspection.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. O. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner.

O. O. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner.

Tabular statement.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As one of the members of the Judiciary Committee from whom this joint resolution comes, I was very reluctant indeed to agree to recommend any appropriation of this kind, lest it should discourage efforts on the part of worthless persons to make a support and living for themselves. While I was quite willing, and I am sure every member of the Senate would be willing, to vote money out of the Treasury of the United States to save from actual suffering and starvation any portion of our population, whether they may have been loyal or disloyal, I was unwilling to give any sort of encouragement to persons in the rebel States, or to hold out any sort of hope to them that the Government of the United States would supply their wants when they had within themselves the means of obtaining a livelihood. But General Howard came before the committee this morning and bore testimony to the fact that from the sources of information which he had through the agents in the employ of the Freedmen's Bureau, there would be actual starvation in many portions of the South among the disloyal, or those who had been disloyal, unless relief was afforded. He stated that the appropriations already made were sufficient to save from starvation the loyal refugees and freedmen; and under the law he is limited in affording relief to that class of persons. None of us would be willing to see even the disloyal and those who have sought to destroy the Government, now that the war is over, suffer and perish for the want of the necessities of life; and on the testimony of General Howard that such would be the case unless something was done, and having great confidence in the judgment and discretion of that officer, and that he would not improperly make distribution under the provisions of this resolution, the committee came to the conclusion to recommend to the Senate the appropriation of $1,000,000 for this purpose.

It will be observed that General Howard estimated the amount at $1,508,750; but as the summer season is coming on, when the class of persons now so destitute and suffering will be able to do something to support themselves, the committee have struck down the amount to $1,000,000, and they report the resolution in the form that it has been read to the Senate, and recommend its passage.

I shall be glad if this appropriation of money, should it be made by the Congress of the United States, shall have a tendency to overcome any of that disloyal feeling which still lingers in the South; and I trust that, in addition to the relief which it shall afford to the starving and the destitute, it will carry, if passed by the Congress of the United States, to the people of the southern States the assurance that the Government is disposed to deal kindly and beneficently with them, and that there is no disposition on the part of the Government to deal cruelly or harshly; and we may in that way, in bringing about a good state of feeling, and by the exhibition of this generosity on the part of the Federal Government, even to those who are its enemies, receive a full return for the amount of money which shall be voted, in addition to the relief which it will afford to those who are actually suffering for the want of the necessities of life.

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me that no one who has given this subject careful consideration will doubt the fact that General Howard is correct, that wide-spread destitution exists in large portions of the southern country in consequence of the ravages of the war and the subsequent failure of the crops, and that there must be extreme suffering. Although this relief goes to the families of those who have been disloyal, the women and children perhaps are not guilty parties, and we believe that the people of this country are unwilling even to see the disloyal die of starvation, and consequently the committee have reported this resolution. It does not appear as much as General Howard asked for; but we believe that by his economical management and discrimination he will be able to relieve the larger portion of the suffering, the more extreme cases, and accomplish great good. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. POMEROY. I have had, and I suppose every Senator has had his attention called to the condition of some portions of the southern States. I know that individuals have exerted themselves to a considerable extent to relieve the want and suffering which exist there; but I believe that voluntary and individual effort will be entirely inadequate. I know societies have been formed, and men are contributing liberally in many of our cities to aid in relieving this destitution. I should be glad if that were sufficient; but the suffering is so widespread, it extends so deep and so far, that I think some action is required on the part of the Government. I do not think we can look upon the sufferings of our fellow-citizens, no matter what may have been their errors in the past, with indifference, much less with neglect. I do not believe we can allow starvation as a punishment for anything. I shall vote for this resolution in a spirit of kindness and charity, hoping that the people whom it is to benefit will remember and feel that they have not enemies, but friends, not only in the national Congress, but in the North and throughout the country.

Mr. SPRAGUE. General Howard's estimate is $1,500,000. The committee recommended $1,000,000. It seems to me that the recommendation of the General should be considered. He thinks $1,500,000 is the lowest amount that will relieve the suffering and destitution there. I should be glad to vote to add $500,000 to the amount recommended by the committee. I know of no officer or man in this country in whose hands I would so freely place any amount that the Government can give. I do not know of any man who would distribute these charities better than General Howard, and I do not think there will be any mistake on our part if we should amend the resolution so as to comply with his suggestion. I therefore propose to amend the joint resolution by increasing the appropriation to $1,500,000, and I trust the Senate will agree to the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I for one am disposed to favor this amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island. I not only have received many letters bearing on this subject, but just before the commencement of the last session of Congress I spent a month or more in traveling through the States of the South, and from information derived from persons from all the States of the South I came into possession of facts which satisfied me that it would be utterly impossible for the people of some portions of those States to go through until the next crop should be raised without actual starvation, such as has never existed on this continent. At the very best, throughout the whole of the southern States there was not to exceed one fourth of a crop of corn and breadstuffs, not over a fourth of a crop of cotton, and in Louisiana very little sugar was raised. The State of Texas has, perhaps, a third of a full crop of corn and a half crop of cotton, and is well enough, rich enough, perhaps the richest of the States of the South at the present time; for during the war the communication across the State of Texas in the transportation of cotton into Mexico, where it was taken by the French, in payment for which they gave gold and silver, was so great that even at the present time in the State of Texas the currency of the people is gold and silver, as it is in California, Nevada, and the mining States. But when you get into the States east of that, into Alabama, into Georgia, into North and South Carolina, the failure of the crops, the breaking up of society, the change of the system of labor have led to the presentation of such a spectacle as appeals to the good sense and the charity and the magnanimity of the whole American people. I am, therefore, perfectly willing to join with the Senator from Rhode Island and give this amount into the hands of General Howard to meet these cases of destitution. As a matter of course, General Howard and the officers under him will render an account as to the mode of expenditure.

Mr. JOHNSON. Being a member of the committee which reported this resolution, and having agreed in committee to reduce the appropriation asked for by General Howard from $1,500,000 to $1,000,000, I should not have offered an amendment to enlarge the amount suggested by the committee; but the General himself, although he may be able to accomplish the object of such an appropriation with $1,000,000, is by no means certain that such will be the case. He thinks that there may be cases of starvation, and, in common with all who have hearts within their bosoms, he is exceedingly anxious himself personally, and above all for the reputation of the country, that such a condition of things as the starvation of our own people should not even be put to hazard. Without having been South since the rebellion further than Virginia, I have, owing to the fact of my being a citizen of a southern State, had perhaps more intercourse, both personally and by correspondence, with persons in those States than some Senators who come from other States; and I think I am warranted in saying that it is the received opinion of the men of that section in whom all confidence is to be placed that starvation to a considerable extent is inevitable unless Congress extends a helping hand to avoid it. The march of our armies—I find no fault with the generals in command, for all things must necessarily have yielded to the exigencies in which they were placed, to the duty in which they were engaged of putting down the rebellion—the march of our armies through the South left large portions of that territory in a state of utter desolation, and the men who constituted the army of the confederacy were reduced to almost starvation before the surrender, having been fed for months upon what no northern man would consider to be food at all; and they returned, therefore, to their homes in a great measure physically unable to work, and they all returned, even those who were physically able to work, finding their homes in such a condition that it was impossible for them to provide for the wants of themselves and their families.

It is true, Mr. President, that during the war I shared in the feeling which animated all the loyal States, that at all hazards the Union was to be restored by the suppression of the rebellion; but that having been accomplished, I am satisfied I but participate in the feelings which animate all the Senators from the loyal States when I say that, without regard to their past errors or their past crimes, we are bound to provide for them, not only as fellow-citizens, but as fellow-men, to guard above all against that worst of all deaths, starvation. I have been told by some of our own generals, particularly those whose duty has been in the State of Alabama, that they have seen lying upon the roadside men, women, and children in a state of starvation, dying for want of food.

It is due also, Mr. President, to the citizens of the South who were not entirely deprived of their property by the war to say that they have exerted themselves to the utmost, have offered to pledge whatever property they had left, for the purpose of raising means with which to feed their starving fellow-citizens; but they have done all that they can accomplish, and the South now is in a state of destitution fully equal to that which led to the starvation of the Irish, which the people of the United States did all they could to arrest. I should therefore be exceedingly glad to have the appropriation increased to the amount asked for by the officer in whose hands it is to be placed; and I am sure I speak the sentiment of the entire country, North and South, when I say that there was not during the war an officer who more zealously and gallantly performed his duty upon the field, or who has since discharged with greater skill and fidelity the trust confided to him by Congress; and he tells us, what we must have known before, that no matter how large the appropriation, not a dollar of it will be expended unless he finds it absolutely necessary in order to save American citizens from death by starvation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The committee who had this resolution in charge, after careful consideration and after having an interview with the Commissioner, General Howard, came to the conclusion that the best sum now to appropriate was $1,000,000. The object of this resolution is, according to its terms, to prevent starvation, to prevent real want; and I think General Howard agreed with the committee that the sum named, $1,000,000, would be sufficient for that purpose.

This measure, while I am on my feet, I will take the liberty of saying meets the approval of my heart. In this common-place world we now and then have an incident of sublimity. When our fathers pledged their lives, fortunes, and sacred honors to establish independence; when that rough hand wrote "Abraham Lincoln" and four million human creatures were set free—these were incidents of sublimity. And, Mr. President, this scene here to-day, after a great people have poured out their blood, after a great people have expended their treasure to preserve from destruction—from the destruction of a crime that has no name—a great Republic, then to see them turning round and saying to their foes, even to their unrepentant foes, if "you are hungered we will feed you;" that is moral, nay, sir, that is Christian sublimity.

I do not want to boast, but I may say that no State in the field did her duty any better than New Jersey, and I know that my colleague and myself can give no vote that our constituency will more approve than voting this $1,000,000 for provisions to relieve the destitute people of the South and to distribute them without regard to the political sentiments of the beneficiaries.

All that has been said in reference to the Commissioner is true. The Old World had its Howard, who braved the contagions of dungeons, who met all the perils that philanthropy could invite him to, and we have got a one-armed soldier so brave and so prudent and so philanthropic that he does honor even to the honored name he bears.

Sir, we have had important legislation in Congress during the past session. Let us now consecrate it by this act of Christian charity. Let the Commissioner be the almoner of this nation, and let the closing act before we separate be one of sublime philanthropy. I trust the resolution will receive the unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say a word upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island. The amount estimated by General Howard was $1,508,750. The committee reported $1,000,000. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to increase it to $1,500,000, as proposed by General Howard. But it will be observed, if Senators will look at General Howard's letter, that in making up the sum of $1,508,000 he has given a statement in detail of the number of persons, both whites and blacks, that will need assistance in these States, and then he estimates rations for all of them for five months at twenty-five cents apiece. Now, they will not require these full rations for that time, and so we are informed by General Howard himself; but it was thought there might be additional persons who would need something; and he states in this communication, and so stated to the committee, that he has now on hand all the money necessary to feed all the persons who are destitute and suffering in the South that it is proper to furnish supplies to be embraced in the provisions of the Freedmen's Bureau act, and this appropriation is to furnish supplies to outside persons. Of course he could not tell exactly what the amount might be. He has on hand now unexpended $700,000. We appropriated the other day $625,000. That makes $1,325,000 that he has at his disposal. Now we propose another $1,000,000 for the outside persons not reached by the provisions of the Freedmen's Bureau act. The committee considered this subject carefully, had General Howard before them, and I submit to the Senate that it would be better to adopt the suggestion of the committee of $1,000,000 as being the proper sum necessary to appropriate. I know that the feelings of Senators are touched by this appeal from the destitute and suffering, and they would be willing to vote any amount perhaps that should be deemed to be necessary; but the committee to whom this subject was referred, and who have spent considerable time upon it this morning in connection with General Howard, came to the conclusion that $1,000,000 was enough. I think the Senator from Rhode Island had better withdraw his amendment and let it stand at the sum reported by the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I should be glad to hear the resolution read.

The Secretary read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment is to increase the sum appropriated from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to make a suggestion to the honorable Senator who reports this resolution. It is with reference to the ground on which the resolution proceeds. I do not know what the honorable Senator's idea is of the power which is exercised here in this grant. It will be seen that by the phraseology of the resolution we make this grant in consequence of the failure of the crop. If it is on that ground, it is a little difficult for me to see where we get the authority.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That phrase is inserted in the resolution to show how it happens that this destitution exists. The ground upon which I should put the authority to pass the resolution is this: we have been engaged in a great war; during the progress of that war the South has been overrun by our armies; and it is now stated to us that in consequence of their being unable to raise any crops there a portion of the inhabitants are in a starving condition; and I think upon the same principle that we could take them prisoners and feed them as prisoners of war, we may, as a nation, having control at this time of all those rebel States, they still being under military control, feed the starving and the destitute. I have no doubt about the constitutional power to do that. The recital in the resolution, that it is in consequence of the failure of the crops that this destitution exists, might be left out of the resolution; I do not think that affects it one way or the other. I presume we never should have been called upon or thought of appropriating anything in this case except for the recent war.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I can understand that the resolution might very properly be passed upon the principle now stated by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The difficulty is that the resolution itself negatives the idea that it proceeds upon that ground. I suppose there is no difficulty in making this appropriation upon the ground that these people in the insurrectionary States are subject to our authority and are under our absolute control, and they are in some sense prisoners of war; we are so dealing with them to-day; and of course we may relieve any suffering that arises out of that actual condition of things. I do not doubt that at all. I supposed it was upon some such ground that the honorable chairman of the committee placed this resolution. I suggest to the chairman whether it would meet his views to strike out the words which I will read:

In those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned wide-spread destitution—and simply insert the words "in the insurrectionary States;" so that the resolution will read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want to any and all classes of the people in the insurrectionary States, &c.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should have no sort of objection to that amendment. The joint resolution, I will state, was not drafted by myself. I do not think the amendment very material. I have no objection to it. The resolution as it stands states that the destitution is occasioned "from failure of the crops and other causes," which would bring them all in I suppose; but if it will be more acceptable to the Senator from Maine, although I have no authority to agree to the amendment for the committee, as an individual I have no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to amend it in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified unless objected to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that it be read as it will stand if amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme suffering to any and all classes of the people in the insurrectionary States; that the issues be made through the Freedmen's Bureau under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask to insert the word "late" before the word "insurrectionary."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so modified unless objected to.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator from Maine strike out the words "where extreme destitution exists?" I think it would be well to keep those words in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is implied in the preceding language. They are to relieve suffering and prevent starvation. It is all implied in that.

Mr. WILSON. I vote for this appropriation on the same ground that I voted $25,000 and other sums to the suffering poor of this District, and, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the same as we voted to support the bureau to take care of the refugees and freedmen. It appears that these people by their condition are now in need of aid, and I vote it just as cheerfully as I voted for the other.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the ground on which I put it. I simply wished to exclude any inference that it is simply on account of the failure of the crops.

Mr. DRAKE. The Senator from Maryland proposes to insert in the resolution the word "late" before the word "insurrectionary." I would inquire, sir, whether the Congress of the United States has ever officially recognized the fact that those States are not still in insurrection; whether the Congress of the United States has recognized the fact that the rebellion in those States has been subdued? If it has, then I think the insertion of the word "late" would be very correct; if it has not, I object to the insertion of that word. I ask for information.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better leave out the word "late" and avoid any controversy about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not the slightest objection to that; but I do not see why the honorable member from Maine suggests his amendment at all. I think it better to pass the resolution just as the committee reported it, and I appeal, therefore, to the honorable member to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the chairman thinks so, I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment is withdrawn, I understand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I rose more to suggest it to the chairman than for any other purpose. If he attaches no importance to it, I will withdraw the amendment if it embarrasses the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire what evidence there is before this Senate that this appropriation is needed to prevent starvation? If it is needed for that purpose I am for it; but I should like to have some evidence upon that subject. A charity was never yet voted but what there were found plenty of persons to bring themselves within the scope of it and receive the benefit of it. If we were to vote $5,000,000 for this purpose there would be found plenty of persons bringing themselves within the scope of it, and the full appropriation would be expended. I think there is nothing so important to this country at this time as a rigid retrenchment in appropriations. To vote a million here and a million there, for this purpose and for that, is a habit that must be arrested. The Government of the United States has become accustomed to dealing with large sums of money during the war, and a million seems to be a very small sum; but I am sure there is nothing so important to the Government and to the great Union party as rigid retrenchment in expenditures. I am willing to vote this $1,000,000 if there be evidence that it is needed to prevent starvation; but if there be no sufficient proof on that subject, I am not willing to vote the money, because, as I have before remarked, whenever a charity is voted, there is no failure in its expenditure; persons will always be found who are able to bring themselves within the scope of it and receive the benefit of it. I think there ought to be satisfactory evidence before this Senate before this $1,000,000 is voted.

Mr. STEWART. I think the evidence upon that point is very conclusive. General Howard, in the administration of the affairs of the Freedmen's Bureau, has had unusual opportunities for ascertaining these facts in detail. He has reports from every district. He is in constant communication with them. If any officer of the Government upon whom a difficult task has been imposed has discharged his duty faithfully and discriminatingly it is General Howard. When the Freedmen's Bureau was established I had fearful apprehensions of the execution of it in detail. I feared it would become an establishment not unlike the Indian Bureau, which is the great pool into which we throw all our surplus money, and where it is sunk, against which I have been protesting ever since I have been in Congress. I feared that this might be a similar institution, and that there would not be proper discriminations, and consequently I have watched with a great deal of vigilance the operations of this bureau. I have inquired of persons from that country who were hostile to the establishment as to its practical operations, as to who received the charities, who received the benefits of the bureau, and the uniform testimony, so far as I have been able to ascertain it, has been that it has been dealt out with great discrimination.

The facts of this case are stated in brief in this report of General Howard, which is before us; and I think if any gentleman will consult with him and with others connected with this establishment who understand the exact facts, he will have no doubt of the existence of this extreme suffering for the want of food on account of the failure of the crops.

Mr. HOWARD. As the honorable Senator from Nevada is upon that particular feature of the case, let me ask him does General Howard officially state in his report that any case of starvation has taken place in the insurrectionary States? Does he designate one single instance in which a person capable of taking care of himself, or herself, has perished by starvation in consequence of the shortness of the crop or any other particular cause growing out of the war? We are asked here to appropriate $1,000,000 to prevent starvation. If there be such a state of things existing as requires this charity at our hands we want the proof, at least I do, and we have a reasonable ground for demanding it. If there have been no cases of starvation, and if it be not true that starvation is imminent at the present time, then there is no occasion for the appropriation.

Mr. STEWART. That is very true.

Mr. HOWARD. What I want is the proof.

Mr. STEWART. No Senator would desire the appropriation if this state of destitution did not exist. We did not call on General Howard for an enumeration of those who had died of starvation for individual cases. We do not expect that this appropriation will aid those who are already dead from starvation. That many people have died from starvation during this war and since the war in the South there can be very little doubt. The inquiry which the committee have been pursuing is to ascertain whether there was such a want of food in this region, and such difficulty in supplying that food that the people must necessarily suffer. In answer to that we get a reply from General Howard that there is; and in conversation he explains it, and other gentlemen explain it thus: there are sections of that country over which our armies marched and where they swept everything away. Last year there was a great effort made, and the charity of the North was appealed to to supply these people with seed and means to raise a crop; in some sections of the South they did raise a crop of corn and other necessities; in other sections they devoted themselves almost exclusively to cotton, and the cotton failed and very little corn or food was raised. In other places where they attempted to raise corn, as in a large portion of Georgia, some portion of South Carolina and northern Alabama there was a drought at such a time as cut off the crop. That is the report of parties stationed there. General Howard denies that it is in consequence of any lack of energy on the part of the people, for he says in those sections the whites and blacks alike worked; they did the best they could; they planted their crops, and they have failed.

Last year the northern people subscribed very liberally for the relief of the suffering in these sections of the country; and the people living there having any property have contributed, and my information is that they have contributed of their means as far as it was possible for them to do so. We inquired of General Howard particularly with regard to the disposition of the people who had property in that country, whether they could supply the relief necessary for this suffering, and the reply was that they had done all in their power, and unless there should be some aid for those particular sections until they could have an opportunity to raise another crop the people could not be fed, and there must be extreme suffering. We put the question to General Howard, if there must be starvation, and he said in his opinion it could not be avoided; that there would be starvation and extreme suffering in those sections of the country unless they could have some relief from the Government.

This destitution has continued for so long a period that those who have been engaged in the philanthropic work of supplying the people there have exhausted their means; and it seems to me that the Government could not do a better thing, a more just thing, or one that would meet the approbation of the American people more than to vote this appropriation. Although they have been heavily taxed, although our appropriations have been large, although sometimes they may have been extravagant, still I believe the people of the United States are unwilling, upon a fair case, when the facts are reasonably ascertained, to allow any persons in this country to die of starvation or to suffer extremely from starvation. I do not think there has been an appropriation called for that is based upon a more thorough knowledge of the facts than General Howard has of the facts upon which he asks this appropriation. After consultation with him the committee cut down the appropriation from $1,500,000, which he estimated, to $1,000,000, believing that he can relieve the extreme want with that sum. And I will state here, that the South and the country may understand it, that this is not to be regarded as a precedent; that the South need not expect this thing to be continued; that they must look out for themselves hereafter. But a case appealing to our charity in this form never will be presented again; certainly we hope it may not, as growing out of this war.

Mr. CONKLING. I voted against this proposition in committee, and I did it because I preferred another way of meeting whatever requirement there might be. There was evidence before the committee, in the form of a conversational statement from General Howard, that in parts of the South, particularly in northern Georgia, very considerable want and destitution exist. General Howard stated that he was satisfied that this did not come merely from the fact that armies had swept over that country, but that he was satisfied that other causes, and chiefly drought, had put it out of the power of these people, although they were willing to work, to provide themselves with the means of subsistence. The evidence was not very satisfactory to my mind in the particulars inquired of by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Michigan to show that there are now, or are likely very soon to be, instances of actual suffering or starvation as a rule; and yet I could very well see, from the statement that he made, how there might be such instances in considerable numbers.

But, Mr. President, this is rather a fearful question upon which to make a mistake. It were far better certainly that we should do something which is unnecessary than that we should run a broad risk of the occurrence of actual starvation, which we have it in our power to prevent. Feeling this, I preferred for one to rely for the present upon one of the items of the Army appropriation bill, which appropriates to the Freedmen's Bureau "for commissary stores, $1,500,000," and, if necessary, by law extend to the present purpose the application of that sum. I do not think myself it would be necessary to extend it by law, because it stands in the law "for commissary stores." But if it may be said that that refers to commissary stores to be dispensed under the Freedmen's Bureau law as it existed then, I prefer to change the application, and to leave to General Howard to judge when the time comes whether to prevent actual starvation it be necessary to make some inroad upon this sum, and if so to let it be included in a deficiency bill hereafter.

Mr. President, if I vote in the Senate for this resolution I shall do it with some reluctance, and I shall do it fully remembering what I think was so well said by the Senator from Indiana. I think we have become in both Houses greatly accustomed to large sums, and that appropriations which only a short time ago were unheard of, and which, if proposed, would have excited universal comment, would have invoked the most careful scrutiny, are made now, I do not mean to say without thought, but I mean to say with only that measure of consideration which used to be applicable to very small sums, to very unimportant appropriations.

Now, sir, if it be true that it is necessary that any sum of money should be used to prevent the death by starvation of human beings in this country, so be it; there is no answer to that; but although I did not intend until the questions were asked as to the evidence before us to bring it up in the Senate, I insist—as I thought in the committee—that it would be quite as well to empower the Freedmen's Bureau, if it needs to be so empowered, to devote, when the time shall come that starvation presents itself, some part or parcel of the money already appropriated to this purpose, and let the sum so used be included in a deficiency bill hereafter.

Mr. HARLAN. This subject has been examined, as I understand, by one of the standing committees of the Senate, and they have arrived at the conclusion that some money is necessary to prevent extreme suffering and probably starvation of citizens of the United States. On the faith of the opinion of that committee I am prepared to vote whatever appropriation may be deemed to be necessary.

I have risen, however, to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the unjustifiable remark made by the Senator from Nevada, that in the administration of the affairs of this Government it has regarded the Indian department as the cesspool in which to pour all the surplus funds of the Government. I desire him to state to the Senate on what authority he makes that statement.

Mr. STEWART. I believe I did not use the term "cesspool." I think I said it was a pool into which a large amount of the surplus funds usually found their way. I will state upon what authority I think that institution is a failure—not that I reflect upon any particular officer connected with it. I have lived for many years in an Indian country. I have known the fact that while appropriations were being made constantly here, they were, as a general rule, reaching no good purpose. I have seen my neighbors and friends constantly shot down as they were prospecting, as they were cultivating farms, as they were pioneering, so to speak, in the West; and I have been convinced in nine cases out of ten that it was the mismanagement of the whole Indian system, the fault of the system that was to blame; that the system was inadequate. The Indian traders would have a difficulty with the Indians, and the Indians would take their vengeance upon the innocent inhabitants, and innocent people are now being daily murdered by the Indians with arms that they have obtained from this Government. When this is done you send your armies to chastise them. You fit out an expedition. You pay a large amount of money for that expedition. When the troops get to the neighborhood of the Indian country, and when they have pursued the Indian until they have cut off his supplies, he slips around the army to an agent and makes a contract with your Indian department. The money that you spend for the army is thrown away and the army is removed; and then the Indian commences again to take satisfaction on the settlers. I say that the money expended does not, and has not in the country where I have lived, accomplished the purpose. Large appropriations upon the plea of starving Indians are constantly made here; Indian treaties are passed without consideration; vast amounts of money are expended; they are not allowed to starve, but the money does not reach the starving; they complain; the Government works at cross purposes; the settlers are being constantly murdered; and I believe to-day, and it is the opinion of many who have lived in that country, that if the Government will take away its entire machinery from there, both the army and the Indian department, and leave the settlers and the Indians together, there will be less loss of life and less suffering.

I say that the working of the two departments that are operating in the Indian country has caused the system to be a failure; and I do not believe, with the way that system is organized, that you can put any man at the head of it who can make it a system that is worthy of the American name. It is a failure, under my own personal observation; and I alluded to that incidentally to show how we often appropriate money extravagantly. I alluded to the system, not to individuals. I believe that system to be a failure. I am aware that the Senator from Iowa has recently attempted to make reforms in that system, that he has made strong efforts to remedy the evils of it. That he has succeeded to some little extent I have no doubt. That he has succeeded as much as anybody could with the system, with the two departments of the Government operating in the Indian country, nobody doubts. That he has done his whole duty nobody will question. I make no reflection in my remarks upon any particular individual.

But, sir, I repeat, so long as this Government attempts to act through two sets of agents at cross purposes in the Indian country, so long the settlers must suffer at the hands of the red man; so long the Indian will have his complaint of being cheated, and so long the system will be a failure. One or the other Department should have charge of it and be responsible for it.

But, sir, this Freedmen's Bureau is under the charge of a competent officer, and I believe that he has, as a general thing, been allowed to execute his own orders, and he has been allowed to carry it out in such a way that it has contributed largely to the peace and security of the South. It has been a humane institution; it has been a success; and it is a safe means of distributing the charities of this Government.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has it not cost a great deal more than the Indian department?

Mr. STEWART. It has a great many more to look after; and I doubt whether it has cost more. I think the expenditures of the last year will show that the Indian department cost the most. If you take the expense of fitting out expeditions which have been abandoned before there was any execution, and your war claims, they will amount to more than double the expense of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. HENDERSON. Those are expenditures of the War Department, not of the Indian department.

Mr. STEWART. But the War Department complain, and justly, too, that when their plans are about to amount to anything, you make treaties with the Indians. You work at cross purposes. Nobody is responsible for the Indians. They go to war and kill the pioneers. While they are engaged in that a war expedition is started out against them. When your Army gets near them, they slip around and make peace with your peace commissioners, and the efforts of the War Department amount to nothing, and the Indians are not chastised. The two Departments working at cross purposes are spending large amounts of money. I do not recollect now the exact number of millions of dollars that have been spent in the last year on the Indian department and the War Department operating in the Indian country.

But, sir, this Freedmen's Bureau has been under one Department; it has been under the charge of one man; he has had the general supervision of it; and I say it has been a success. I do not think it has cost near as much money as has been expended for Indian purposes, taking the two Departments that are operating in the Indian country. If you had connected with this bureau a quantity of treaties with these people, if you had a host of contractors, if you had crowds of attorneys for claims connected with it, if it ramified itself through every branch of the Government, if it was an institution that had grown up into its enormous proportions for twenty years, an institution which it is almost political death to some members of Congress if they raise their voice against, if it had grown into those proportions and this was a proposition to continue it, I should be opposed to it. I believe that this Freedmen's Bureau will do its work, as it has done its work, well, and that there is no reason to apprehend danger from it. I had great and serious apprehensions when it was started, but it has more than met my expectations. I did not intend in the remarks that I made any reflection further than upon the present Indian system, to which it is well known I have always been opposed.

Mr. HARLAN. I did not intend to inflict on the Senate a discussion on this subject at this time; I merely desired to have the information on which the Senator based his very grave charge, as I regarded it, on that branch of the public service. I wish to say, however, while I am on my feet, that this conflict in administration which has afflicted his fancy does not exist in fact. Although the Indian Bureau is under the general direction of one of the Departments of the Government and the Army under the direction of another, both of these Departments are under the direction of the President of the United States; and during the brief period in which I had an opportunity to look more intimately into the affairs of both of these Departments than previously there was no conflict of purpose or of execution in the administration of Indian affairs under these two Departments. When an Indian tribe was at war the Interior Department refused to have intercourse with them except through the military authorities; when a tribe was at peace the military authorities refrained from all interference with them except when called upon by the officers of the Interior Department for military force to execute the law and the orders of the Department, and in this way harmony was secured, and prevailed during the whole period, certainly, in which I was connected with one of the Executive Departments. This conflict of theory and of action between these two Departments of the Government to which the Senator has alluded has not existed in fact during the last year and a half at least.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator. It may not exist at Washington in theory; but that it does exist in fact in all the western Territories there is not a man who has lived there and been familiar with affairs there who will not testify. Living in that country and having taken some little interest in regard to the Indian wars that have occurred, having endeavored always to protect the people, I have talked with Indian agents and with military commanders on the subject, and I have found them constantly blaming each other. This conflict is not a new thing; it has long existed. It is a conflict there the merits of which the Departments here cannot very well determine. The subordinates of each Department send their representatives here. Every man living there knows that although theoretically the President is at the head and has the right to determine these matters, still as a matter of fact there are continually cross purposes between the military commanders and the Indian agents, and this prevents the efficiency of either, and makes it a most expensive and unavailable system.

Mr. HARLAN. The real conflict is in the variety of opinions that exist between the people who inhabit some of the new districts of country and those who inhabit the more settled, and the Senator will pardon me for saying more civilized portions of the country. The prevailing public opinion of the Territories is that the Indians ought to be exterminated; the prevailing opinion of the Army is that they ought to be exterminated; the opinion of the Interior Department and its officers is that they ought not to be annihilated. But while we are depriving them of their lands and their ancient homes, and driving away and destroying the game on which they have previously been supported, we should to some extent supply them with the means of subsistence of which they have been robbed by the gigantic march of civilization. It is this conflict of opinion between the frontier settlers, who thus seized without purchase the Indians' lands and homes, and the ancient owners, who cling to the inheritance of their fathers to the plains, valleys, and hills, inhabited by their ancestors for centuries, and who, to prevent their women and children from starvation, occasionally commit depredations on the live stock of the squatters, and not a conflict between the War and Interior Departments which causes the trouble; and the Senator from Nevada, who has just spoken, sympathizes with this sentiment of the frontier inhabitants, who, smarting under their losses and these annoyances, wish the Indians all swept out of existence, and of the Army on the frontier, who think it wiser to kill the Indians than to teach them the arts of civilized life. But if the truth may be spoken, impartial history will record, and the Senator must admit, that in nine cases in ten these Indian depredations are provoked by the white settlers; they are merely in retaliation for depredations committed on them by their white neighbors. Nearly every outbreak which has come to my knowledge has been provoked by the illegal and wrongful act of the white settlers or soldiers. The murder of white people by the Indians has been in nearly every instance preceded by the cold-blooded murder of Indians by the whites, and sometimes by the soldiers garrisoning the outer posts. The Indian war now raging in Arizona began with the unprovoked massacre of a few chiefs, who entered one of our forts, by the garrison.

The recent massacre of about one hundred soldiers and their officers near Fort Phil. Kearney was brought about by the unskillful conduct, to say the least, of the commander of that post, who treated as enemies Indian delegates who came in from Indian bands for the purpose of signing a treaty of peace concluded some months before with other bands of the same tribe.

But I did not rise, Mr. President, to discuss this subject, but merely to state that, with the limited knowledge I have on the subject, and from my observation of their official conduct, it is my deliberate judgment that the Indian Bureau will compare favorably in its management with any other bureau of any Department; and that the officers in its employ are in the aggregate as honest, as capable, and as patriotic as any equal number taken indiscriminately from any other branch of the public service. I will not make an exception in favor of the Army. Take the officers of the Army in the Indian country and they are no more capable or trustworthy than the officers connected with the civil service. If some of the latter commit frauds, so do the former commit frauds of a more gigantic character, because their opportunities are greater. Why should it not be so? Does it make a man more honest to wear straps, to wear a uniform? Does it make a man any more honest to give him a lease of office for life? Is the Army a school of morals, more favorable to the development of Christian perfection than civil life? Why this wholesale denunciation of this branch of the civil service? Nor is the Indian Bureau worse managed than other bureaus connected with the civil service. To illustrate, take the important Bureau of Internal Revenue in the Treasury Department, or the Bureau of Customs.

During the last year, if we can believe a report of a committee of the House of Representatives of the last session, frauds have been perpetrated in the Treasury Department amounting to more millions of dollars than have been expended in the Indian service since the foundation of the Government. We are told by that committee that we ought to have received of internal revenue about ninety million dollars from taxes on whisky alone, and that the Government derived but about thirty or forty million dollars, leaving a deficit on account of frauds of the officers of the Treasury Department amounting to fifty or sixty million dollars in a single year on a single taxable article; and yet the Senator rises here in his place in the Senate and denounces the Indian Bureau as the great conduit for corruption, the great pool into which the surplus funds of the Government are poured, when the disbursements through that Department, all told, do not amount to more than four or five million dollars—I think between four and five million dollars per annum, including the annuities and moneys derived from the proceeds of the sale of Indian lands, and outside of those funds which belong to the Indians the expenditures of that bureau will not amount probably on an average from year to year to much more than three quarters of a million dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps it is the duty of the Chair to remind Senators that this debate verges greatly from the question under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say, if my friend from Iowa would permit me, that I do not see any necessary connection between the subject he is now debating, introduced, as I understand, by the Senator from Nevada, and the question before the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Maryland for his kind admonition, and I will say for his information that I have frequently thought he departed quite as far from the immediate subject under discussion before the Senate as I have on this occasion, and probably has needed such admonitions quite as frequently as I have.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I heard the honorable Senator distinctly. Did he apply his remark to me?

Mr. HENDERSON, [to Mr. JOHNSON.] He said you wandered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not the slightest doubt about that, and I do not propose to stop wandering; because that would, perhaps, stop debate in the body. All I meant to say was that as the resolution was one of great importance, the sooner we pass it the better. I have listened to the honorable member from Iowa with interest and with instruction, and I am rather of the same opinion that he is in relation to the condition of the Indians, and the reason we have had such frequent conflicts with them. I have voted always against intrusting the custody of the Indians to the Army, and shall continue to do so.

Mr. HARLAN. I usually, in remarks I make in the Senate, attempt to confine myself to the subject that is before the body. During the years that I have served here, however, I have observed that it is not a very usual thing to call a gentleman to order for taking a wide range in discussion, particularly when it is in reply to speeches that have been previously delivered which seemed to call for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member will permit me to say that I did not call him to order. I had not the least idea of calling him to order. I suggested that it was desirable to have the resolution passed; that is all. I know the gentleman is in order according to the practice of the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I announced at the outset that I had risen to correct, as far as I could, what I regarded as a false accusation against a Department of the Government with which I have been recently connected; and to correct a false impression being made on the public mind, which, I fear, may crystalize into a policy derogatory to the national honor and in conflict with the principles of humanity. Having made the statements more or less pertinent to this purpose, I cheerfully yield the floor that a vote may be taken on the pending question.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator who has just taken his seat has demonstrated all that I have said. The very first thing he does is to commence to defend the Indian department, though I had not attacked it, and in doing that he attacks the War Department. So if there was a man here who was enthusiastic for the War Department who should undertake to defend that, he would attack the Indian department. It was to this conflict between the two Departments that I alluded, each saying that the other manages badly. Between them the poor settler is murdered. Every man who gets up here to defend the Indian department immediately attacks the War Department; and any one who defends the conduct of the War Department in the Indian country attacks the Indian department. I did not attack either Department; but I said the system was so organized that it was producing no good, and of that opinion is every one who has lived in that country.

I am accused of sympathizing with the people of that country. I do sympathize with them; but I deny that they are desirous for the extermination of the Indians. I deny that the mass of the people in the new Territories desire any such thing. There are bad men there to be sure, but most of the people desire to treat the Indians as kindly as possible. I do sympathize with those people when they fall victims to the cross purposes at Washington. It was unnecessary for the Senator to defend the Indian department when I had not attacked it. It was unnecessary for him to attack the War Department when I had not raised that question. I said both Departments were operating in the Indian country, and the result was that the money expended was a loss. I say it still. I believe we should be better off to-day if both Departments were removed from there and not a dollar expended. I believe the Indians would be happier and better fed, and a less number of the whites would be murdered. I believe that is the truth; but I do not desire to be led off into a discussion on that point. I am sorry that so much time has been occupied in regard to it; but it has been occupied only because of the misapprehension of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON. Some Senators have asked whether there was any information before the Senate in regard to actual destitution and want in the South. I will read an extract from a letter of James E. Yeatman, who during the war occupied a Government position at the city of Memphis, and since that time has been in the South a great deal, in whom I have entire confidence and trust. It is a letter dated St. Louis, January 23, 1867, addressed to me, and which, by order of the Senate, was printed and placed on the files of last session. Mr. Yeatman says:

"While Congress has been occupied with political questions which agitate the country, the true condition of the South, and the near approach of its inhabitants to almost famine and ruin, have escaped its attention.

"The high price of cotton stimulated the planting of that staple, and caused the planters to neglect growing grain and other articles of food, believing, as they did, that with fair crops of cotton they would be able to supply themselves therewith from the granaries of the West at a much cheaper rate than it could be grown on their own lands. The energies and labor of the South, aided by northern capital, with the enterprise of a large number of adventurous men from the East and West, were all concentrated on this one object.

"Various causes have arisen tending to prostrate the people, leaving them nearly ruined, among which I may more especially mention the following, which could not have been foreseen or provided against: the too great drought at one season, which destroyed and blasted their corn; too much rain at another, which injured their cotton; and then the army worm, which came out of the ground in vast numbers, destroying what was left. From these causes all the well-matured plans, the toil and skill of the people, were rendered unavailing."

Again:

"The same terrible scenes of distress from famine are likely to ensue in our own land as did in India during the past season. Our Government, I doubt not, would come to the rescue, when fully aroused to the necessity, and feed the starving millions, but not, I fear, before much suffering had ensued and many had perished; and then it would be as an act of charity or as a gratuity."

The letter is quite a lengthy one, and I shall not take up the time of the Senate by reading it all. In another part of it Mr. Yeatman says:

"Famine is in the land, or soon will be. The wolf is at the door, and something must be done to prevent it from entering in and destroying thousands and tens of thousands of helpless women and children. We can avert it, and it should be averted. The laws of humanity and Christianity all require that we should. Besides, it is to the interest of the Government, outside of that broad and just philanthropy which should govern us as a nation."

"To defer this until next Congress will be too late to be effective; it must be done now. I believe the great American heart will bear Congress out in any generous and liberal action which it might take. We have seen that, when it so may choose, it can put measures through on the double quick. This is one that will brook no delay, and prompt action will be sanctioned and justified now and forever by all those who are not actuated by revengeful feelings. By such action great suffering will be prevented, and prosperity and peace will soon be fully restored."

I presented the letter some time in February, and it was printed by order of the Senate. I have information from other parties in the southern States by conversation which is of the same tenor. I am not aware, and I do not believe that the proposed action of the Senate will give very great relief in those States. A million dollars will amount to very little; and hence I felt some hesitancy in proposing anything in the way of relief. I am not very favorable to making large appropriations for purposes of this character; but if starvation is in the land—and the information that has been received by the committee deputed especially to inquire into this subject, and the information communicated to me by Mr. Yeatman and others, leaves no doubt on that point—something must be done. Mr. Yeatman has been an unflinching Union man from the beginning of the war. He certainly has had no sympathies whatever with the purposes of the rebellion. He is a gentleman in whom I have entire trust; and if he can be believed, something should be done in order to prevent great distress and suffering in the South. My idea was a different one from that now presented. I desired to take off the burdens from the great agricultural product of those States, and thereby to induce immigration into the South from the northern States. If capital and labor from the northern States were to enter the South, the whole country would be benefited. Cotton can be grown there at a profit. The difficulty is that capital is needed in order to produce it. It requires money in the beginning of the crop; it requires that money shall be expended for the labor necessary to produce it.

If those persons who are now suffering could be employed and the money furnished to them to supply their wants as their labor was rendered, it would be a great deal better than to make a distribution in the manner pointed out by this resolution. I thought so, and I think so still, and it is not my opinion that this appropriation will be of much service. I shall vote for it, however, because when suffering humanity calls in a case of this sort I feel that I am under obligation to respond to it. Humanity requires that I shall cast a vote in favor of this resolution, but I fear very much that the aid will be of a temporary character, that the relief will be ephemeral indeed. Other demands may be made, and when you once establish a precedent of this character you do not know where it will end. It is a dangerous precedent. I voted for the appropriation in the case of Portland because suffering humanity demanded it; the destitution of the people demanded it, and I did not stop to inquire, nor will I in this case, because the proper committee report to us that this appropriation is absolutely necessary to prevent starvation. That seems to be the information we get from all reliable sources.

I have no feeling about this matter. If the information is such as to induce Senators to vote for the resolution upon the ground that it is absolutely essential to prevent starvation, of course they ought so to vote and not to make further inquiry about it; but if it is to lay a precedent for future appropriations and large appropriations as a means of encouraging idleness, I should oppose it. I think the time ought very soon to arrive when the large appropriations for the Freedmen's Bureau ought to be stopped. I am satisfied that if we open the South to immigration, open it up to energy, and encourage the cultivation of sugar and cotton, the great agricultural staples of the South, it is all that will be needed in order to revitalize the South and enable the people there to provide the means for their own subsistence. If the whites and blacks among the poor people of the South are furnished with capital, and that capital can only be furnished by immigration, and that immigration can be furnished by proper encouragement in the shape of legislation on the part of Congress, and that can be done by taking the taxes off those articles which they grow, such as sugar and cotton, there will be no necessity for these appropriations. That is my opinion. I think we ought very soon, by a system of legislation looking to the building up of industry in the southern States, supplying capital there, supplying labor with the means to sustain itself, which they have not now, to be able to bring about a resumption of the old state of affairs and to cease making these large appropriations for feeding either whites or blacks. We ought to stop it everywhere, and the time must soon arrive when, if we ever expect to resume the old state of affairs, we must cease to do these things. If from year to year we make large appropriations we encourage idleness, we encourage a state of affairs in every section of the country rather to look to Congress for relief than to go to work and help themselves.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I will simply say that I shall vote cheerfully for this resolution as it came from the hands of the committee appropriating $1,000,000; and I do not think that on this occasion we ought to take into consideration questions pertaining to reduring the expenses of the Government, questions of political economy, questions connected with the Army or the Indians. I take it that this condition of things in the southern country has been brought about, to a great extent, by the rebellion through which we have passed. We have had to appropriate millions of dollars for the refugees and for the freedmen; and in doing that I believe we have added millions upon millions of dollars to the productive industry of the country; and that we have adopted the only wise policy we could have done under the circumstances. It now appears that by the disturbed state of that country and by the failure of crops a portion of that people are in a destitute condition. Sir, it is the duty of this Government, of this rich nation, to extend a helping hand to the suffering, and I vote it just as cheerfully as I voted the money to aid the starving freedmen and the starving refugees, actuated by the same motive.

I agree that our expenditures have been enormous; that we ought to commence a system of rigid economy; but there are higher duties than saving money. Humanity, elevation, development, improvement of the people of the country are greater than saving the dollars of the people. Therefore I hope we shall all of us agree to appropriate this $1,000,000. It goes into the hands of the Freedmen's Bureau. It will be honestly distributed, I have not a doubt; and they, having their agents all over that portion of the country, will be able to distribute it in the best possible manner. It will do something to alleviate the suffering.

Further, sir, I have no fear of making precedents. Whenever there shall be need in a case like this of voting money I believe it is our duty to vote it. We shall always have some cases of suffering or of great disaster brought upon some portions of our country or of the world every few years. These come in the providence of God, and we must meet them and do our duty as humane and Christian men in the premises.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, a little less than a year ago almost a whole city in the State of Maine, my native State, was destroyed by fire. It was one of the most frightful and overwhelming calamities which ever overtook a community. It created a profound sensation and excited a deep sympathy all over this country. That sympathy entered these Halls. It was proposed to contribute a sum of money to relieve the distress occasioned by that fire. The necessity for relief I did not for a moment doubt. The propriety of its being furnished by the national Legislature I could not for my life believe in. I felt, therefore, compelled most reluctantly to vote against that proposition.

I do not stand here a moment to debate the question whether the relief now asked for is required in these southern districts or not. Assuming that it is, it seems to me it is a relief which should be furnished either by the local governments themselves, or it is a relief which should be supplied by voluntary contribution from those who are able and willing in this country; and the sufficiency of this last source of relief I do not doubt. I know it is ample. There is no disposition to withhold such contributions whenever they are required in any portion of the country. It will not be withheld if asked for now. But for the Legislature to undertake to administer the charities of the nation I do not believe is proper; I cannot consent to it. But if it were proper, if we are the administrators of the national charities, I would almost starve myself before I would vote for such a beggarly pittance as $1,000,000 to supply ten million starving people. If you are going to speak in the name of the national charities, if you are going to put your hands into the Treasury and dedicate it to this purpose, do it in a way which will afford relief, and which will become the honor of the nation.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to say, in reply to that point, that we are doing considerable now through the Freedmen's Bureau. We cannot expect to relieve the general poverty of the South, but there are districts where there is absolute starvation, and it is only proposed to extend this relief in those extreme cases. Of course we cannot place all the people in a comfortable situation; we cannot relieve them from the ills consequent on this war. That is not anticipated; but there are districts in four or five of the States where food, rations dealt out, where we have the machinery to do it, will, according to the opinion of those who have investigated the subject, and according to the opinion of General Howard, relieve starvation temporarily, and we believe it is proper to extend relief in such cases.

Mr. HOWE. I understand what is proposed. It is proposed simply because great destitution exists in one portion of the country, not to relieve or remove that destitution, but to vote $1,000,000 out of the Treasury, no matter whether it touches the destitution or relieves it or not. You undertake in one breath to be the administrators of the national charity and then to vote a sum which is no charity whatever and will do nothing. It is ten cents apiece upon ten million people. I do not suppose they are all actually starving, but then such a beggarly sum as that will do almost nothing in the way of furnishing relief. Because the sum is not adequate, therefore, as a national appropriation for such a purpose as is presented here I would not vote for this resolution; but if it were adequate I would not vote for it for the reason that I withheld my vote from the appropriation that was made here during the last session to relieve the city of Portland.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this were a new question I think I would be governed by the views expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin. As an original question, I am not able to see how Congress ought to provide for local embarrassments; but at the close of the war it was the judgment of Congress that provision ought to be made for the freedmen and for refugees, and money was appropriated for that purpose and is being expended under the supervision of the Freedmen's Bureau. The proposition now before the Senate is simply to increase the amount appropriated by $1,000,000, and to extend the operation of the system to another class of persons who are not freedmen perhaps, and who may not be refugees, but persons found in that section of country in a starving condition. Therefore as Congress has adopted a policy upon this subject, has appropriated money, I cannot conceive that there is the objection which the Senator suggests. We simply say that there shall be $1,000,000 more appropriated than we have already appropriated for this sort of purpose, and that it shall be extended to another class of individuals. On that ground I shall vote for the measure. I do not agree with the Senator, however, that because the amount appropriated will not relieve all cases, therefore I will not vote for a partial relief. A million of dollars may save some persons from starvation. That is a sufficient answer to the last criticism of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. The precedent to which we are cited by the Senator from Indiana will not answer my purpose, though it doubtless answers his own. I see no analogy between the two cases. There were soon after the close of the late war some three million persons of various colors and complexions who had been property, had been in the eye of the local law chattels. By a national act they were translated from that condition and were put in the eye of the law in the place of men and women, human beings. They were no longer the property of individuals and they scarcely owned themselves. They had no government and no right to form a government. There was no local authority charged with the custody or care or control of them, and none that we would allow to be charged with the care, the custody, or control of them. We were obliged to do something for them. They never had been allowed to earn a dollar for themselves, and we stripped them from the protection of those who had had the interest of ownership in taking care of them; set them out apart from their late owners, in absolute destitution, with no possible means of serving or saving themselves, and no local government to serve or save them. There was an absolute necessity then, an absolute necessity for the nation to take care of the people they had placed in that position.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As far as the argument of the Senator goes it has some force; but the law to which I referred provided not only for those who had been manumitted, but for a class of white persons who had never been in the condition of slavery, described in the bill as "refugees;" and under that provision of the bill a very large number of white people have come under the care of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. HOWE. The difference between the refugee and the freedman was simply this: the refugee was not such through any act of the nation, but he was compelled to be such through the act of the only local authorities existing about his own home. In my judgment the nation should have made very different provision for both of these classes. Instead of establishing a bureau, a national bureau here, to protect either the colored freedman or the white refugee, I, as the whole Senate, and I trust by this time the whole country, know, if I could have had my way, would have had a local government provided for each one of those communities not only able but disposed to furnish protection to both classes. But that the Congress was indisposed to do, and this was the only other thing they could do. But now the very men whom you propose to relieve by this resolution are the men who do have a government down there, who are administering the local authorities, and in the course of that administration have the disposition of all the property within their limits just as completely as the government of New York has under its care and under its direction the whole resources of the State of New York.

Mr. NYE. I hope sir, this resolution will pass. If I were to say to my friend from Wisconsin that I think he is drawing a fine distinction when the voice of hunger is ringing in our ear, I should say no more than I really feel. It is enough for me to know, Mr. President, that citizens of this country are in a state of starvation.

Mr. HOWE. My friend will allow me a word by way of correction. The point of difference between my friend from Nevada and myself is as to what is a fine distinction. I am simply distinguishing between that which is mine, and which I am willing to contribute for this or any other charitable purpose, and that which belongs to the public. I do not consider that to be a fine distinction which discriminates between what is mine and what is somebody else's.

Mr. NYE. I was about to relieve the Senator from any apprehension that I indulged in the sentiment he has suggested, by saying that we have several precedents to which we can resort on this occasion. I recollect very well when Kansas was in her difficulties, the State of New York, as a State, through her Legislature, contributed $50,000 for the purpose of buying seed for the citizens of Kansas. I recollect that during the last session, when fire desolated and devastated a large portion of the city of Portland, the Senate voted $50,000 for the relief of the sufferers. What I mean to suggest is, that when I hear the cries of hunger I am not going to read the Constitution carefully to find reasons for rejecting the appeal. I hold that the first great duty of the Government is to protect its citizens; and I shall not look for constitutional power to do that; it is inherent in the Government itself; and whenever the time arrives that this Government does not yield protection to its citizens, its vitality and its power are gone.

Neither, sir, is it Christianlike to inquire how these people got into this difficulty. If I see my neighbor in trouble, my first duty is to extricate him, and talk about how he got into it afterward. I am in favor of this measure because the cause of humanity demands it. I am in favor of it for another purpose and another object, and I wish the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] were here to hear what I have to say on this point. I was a strong advocate for the establishment of the Freedmen's Bureau. I thought I saw in that measure an instrument that would administer its duties in such a way as to command, ere the sun had rolled its round twelve months, the respect of those who opposed it. I said then, and I repeat, that that was a measure born of the necessity of the hour, and it was pregnant with results that would manifest themselves more apparently in the future. I rejoice that the occasion, although it is solemn, if it must come, has come under these auspices. It will show the southern people that that great measure of good and of beneficence was a measure that originated not in the prejudices, but in the enlarged generosity of a people that felt kindly toward them. It is now the very instrument through which the hungry are to be fed, and the naked clothed; and in the day of judgment I do not want my vote to stand recorded against feeding the hungry or clothing the naked citizens of my own country. The measure for the establishment of the Freedmen's Bureau, which was then opposed so strongly by the Opposition in this House, has so operated that they have now become obliged to praise it as an institution pregnant with good.

Now, sir, it is enough for me to know that these people are hungry. I am opposed to the suggestion of the Senator from New York, because that would reduce these people to the position that our prisoners were at Andersonville before he would feed them. God knows I desire to see no more walking skeletons, whatever their offenses may have been. I would not keep General Howard feeling their pulse to see just when a mouthful of food was necessary to save their lives, and administer it then as if it were medicine. No, sir, I want the bounty of this Government to go in no such way; I want the mouths of the rebels fed, so that they shall see that their only safety is in returning to their good father's house, where there are many mansions and bread enough and to spare; that while they are without they are feeding on husks, but when they return they shall have the fatted calf. Sir, these people are hungry, and we are here talking. Let us stop talking, vote this appropriation, feed the hungry, and then our duty will be done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it always affords me great delight to listen to the honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE.] In the midst of the wickedness of the times and the common unkindness of our obligations to a higher Power, and when we are compelled to think, perhaps, that we have not laid up those treasures in Heaven which shall serve us at a future day, it is refreshing to know that there is at least one Senator in this Chamber who looks to those beautiful mansions in the skies, and who expects at last to repose in the paradise of his Father and his God. But, sir, I did not rise so much to express my delight at hearing the sublime, Christian sentiments which have been enunciated by the honorable Senator from Nevada, or to express my great gratification to find that he is in the fold of the righteous and looks forward to that last great day when it shall be said to those who have fed the hungry and clothed the naked, "Blessed are ye! Enter into the mansions prepared for ye;" but I rose simply to ask the honorable Senator who, notwithstanding the Christian graces which adorn his character, and the Christian sentiments which prompt his action, never allows any opportunity to pass by without a fling at his political opponents on this floor; my object, I say, was simply to ask that honorable Senator where was the great and violent opposition to the appropriation for the relief of the sufferers in Maine to which he referred, and where has there been any bane for this appropriation by gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber? Sir, I had thought that a gentleman whose character was so molded in the spirit of the principles of Christianity would allow this occasion, at least, which is devoted to the consideration of a charitable purpose, to pass by without a political fling at his opponents.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I asked a question some time ago as to the evidence upon which it was proposed to vote $1,000,000 out of the Treasury, and I was referred to the letter of General Howard upon this subject. Upon an examination of this letter I find that he states that some thirty-two thousand six hundred whites and twenty-four thousand two hundred blacks will probably need relief between this time and harvest; but he does not say one word about starvation. He says they will need relief, and the question asked by the Senator from Michigan was a very pertinent one, whether any cases of starvation had occurred. If this destitution is so great some cases most probably have occurred before this time. But the letter of General Howard does not, in my opinion, furnish sufficient evidence upon which to vote away $1,000,000. He does not state that there will be starvation; but he says that this number of persons will need relief. I take it that it is but a question between poor living and fair living. I have no doubt that many of these people will be reduced to the necessity of living upon a few articles of food, and they of a coarse character; but that there is evidence sufficient to warrant the voting $1,000,000 out of the Treasury for that purpose I am not satisfied.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] says that money has been appropriated already for the support of the freedmen and for refugees. In the case of the freedmen, they were just emancipated from slavery; they were without property, without homes, and without the means of making a living. So that illustration is not in point. In the case of the refugees they had been driven from their homes to distant States, deprived of all their property, and had no means of making a living. That case is not in point.

These people are not included in the former bill; they are neither freedmen nor refugees; but they are in plain terms rebels. They have so-called State governments to take care of them, and they have county governments to take care of them; but still I would not hesitate one moment on account of their being rebels to vote this money if they were in danger of starvation. They are still men and women, and they have the common claims of humanity upon us; but their case is essentially different from that of the freedmen or that of the refugees.

The argument of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] and of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] is good in favor of making annual appropriations for the relief of hunger and suffering all over this land. There is not a large city in this Union in which there is not hunger and suffering every winter, in which I undertake to say there are not deaths from starvation every winter; and the claim of humanity is as strong upon us there as it is in these southern States, and the arguments offered would be as good in favor of making appropriations for them as for the persons designated in this resolution. Yet, sir, will it be pretended that the Government of the United States can indulge in annual charities, and that it can vote to put bread into the mouth and clothes upon the naked back of the suffering simply because they have claims of humanity upon us? No, sir. Whatever may be our feelings of humanity and kindness for these objects of charity, we cannot enter upon that general system. It must be left to the common humanity of private contribution or to the local authorities to provide for. The Government of the United States, from its Constitution, cannot, it dare not, undertake to provide charity for the suffering and for the starving the land over.

But, as I before said, it is a matter of great importance to this Government and to this people that there should be retrenchment in our expenditures. We cannot afford to go on in this way. There will be a limit to our capacity, and when that limit comes, though starvation shall come after it, we cannot relieve it. As a matter of self-preservation of the Government, to protect our credit, and to protect the party that has the majority upon this floor, the expenditures must be brought to the lowest point consistent with justice to the soldiers, the credit of the nation, and the efficient performance of the functions of the Government.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I cannot appreciate the distinction drawn by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] We appropriated for the freedmen, he says, because they were liberated suddenly, thrown upon the country, and needed it, and would otherwise have starved. In other words, it was an emergency, and our action was justifiable. It was because humanity required it. I indorsed it, and so did every good man in this country. We appropriated for the loyal refugees because they had been driven from their homes, not because they had contributed to the country or anything of that kind, but because they were suffering for food. Humanity indorsed that. We did not appropriate for that class of individuals, however, who had suffered from the calamities of this war and were disloyal. We did not appropriate for women and children, the male portion of whose families were engaged in rebellion. We left them to private charity. Private charity has done much for them, and probably would have done all that was required if another calamity had not occurred besides the calamity of war, which has deprived them of the crops which they attempted to raise by means of their industry, which General Howard says in those sections was as great as in any part of the country. The blacks and whites in those sections of the country where they are now suffering did their best. It was in the poor sections of the South. They have had, I say, an additional calamity. They had war that drove them from their homes. Perhaps the male relatives of many of those who are now suffering were drafted into the armies and perished there, leaving their families in a country that was devastated by war. Charity attempted to relieve them and did much last year, but the crops have failed and they are now starving. Is not that an extraordinary condition of things, as much so as either of the other cases? If there is any such destitution in the North, let us relieve it as we relieved the inhabitants of Portland, in Maine, last year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That bill did not pass.

Mr. STEWART. I voted for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It passed the Senate, but not the other House.

Mr. STEWART. This is an extraordinary circumstance, and it appeals to humanity as much as the other cases for which we have provided. While the gentleman who has this subject in special charge is reluctant to ask for appropriations, while he is extremely cautious with the public money, while he is as conscientious and as loyal as any man in this Government, and as careful about squandering money, he deems it necessary, in the name of humanity, that the people shall be relieved. I say we should relieve them no matter how these calamities have come upon them. A calamity came upon the negro; he was thrown upon the world without a protector and was starving. The nation paid its money freely to save him from starvation. A calamity fell upon the refugee; he was driven from his home and was starving; the nation did not inquire further, but fed him. Now a calamity has fallen upon a certain section of the South; in addition to the war, famine has come, and I do not believe that the precedent of serving food to these people, when we have the machinery to do it, will ever endanger this nation, will ever impoverish your Treasury. I believe the nation will be stronger and better for this act, and I believe every Senator who votes for it will have an approving conscience in consequence of that vote. It has not been rashly brought forward; it has not been brought forward without due consideration. Half the testimony we receive daily is not before the Senate. Societies have been organized throughout the North for the purpose of extending relief; but the destitution is so wide-spread and so general that it is impossible for them to continue to meet all the demands upon them. All we ask is to extend temporary relief until the southern people can have one good crop. They have not yet had one good crop since the war.

Let us aid them in this matter. We have the machinery to do it, and we are doing precisely analogous things for a portion of their people. If we do not do it we draw a distinction. It is saying that you will inquire into the fact whether a child that is starving had a loyal or a disloyal father. If you will feed the children of a refugee who was loyal, if you will feed negroes who were loyal, why will you not feed in the same neighborhood the orphan children whose parent was drafted into the confederate army and there died? If you refuse to feed them, it is because you are willing thus to inquire when you are feeding the hungry, whether they were loyal or disloyal. I do not believe this nation will make that inquiry. It is a blot on humanity that our soldiers in southern prisons were allowed to die of hunger and starvation. We regret in the name of humanity that the southern people did not feed our soldiers when they were starving there. It is a blot on the American name to inquire, when you are about to feed the hungry, whether the person in want of aid is good or bad.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, I rise to make a single inquiry of the committee who have presented this resolution. I desire to know whether they have any information from any particular portion of the country in regard to the distress. I notice by the estimate of Major General Howard that he has estimated for Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana. Texas is the only State that is not in want according to this estimate. Now, if it be the fact that the people are starving in all these States, if the rains have been withheld in each of these States, it is certainly a providential circumstance, and it would seem to place it in the power of the northern States to contribute to the relief of the starving people of the South. It seems to me, however, somewhat extraordinary that this estimate should be made in regard to each and every State, and therefore I desire to inquire of the committee whether there was any evidence as to this destitution existing in particular States, or whether there was any evidence, as this estimate would seem to imply, that starvation exists to a great extent in all these States?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. ANTHONY. I was about to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust we shall be able to get a vote on this resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this debate goes on, our opportunity to do executive business to-day will be entirely gone. It seems to be evident now that this subject will be debated until dinner time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. Let us finish it.

Mr. CORBETT. I merely wish to say that I desire, if I err, to err on the safe side. I desire to vote for this appropriation, but I wish to vote for it understandingly, and for that reason I made the inquiry.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated very briefly when this resolution was first brought forward to the consideration of the Senate what sources of information we have. I was very much impressed by the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I felt very much as he did when this application was made to the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the communication to which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORBETT] has alluded, was referred. We had Major-General Howard before us, and I questioned him very closely, as closely as I knew how, with regard to his sources of information and the condition of things in the South. I put the question to him directly whether, in his opinion, there were any districts in the South where persons would actually die of starvation if there were not supplies furnished. He answered that he thought there were. I inquired of him, then, whether there were not sufficient supplies of food in all the districts in the hands of some persons, if they would share them with the destitute, to prevent starvation. He thought there were districts of country in the South where there were not. He stated his sources of information to be communications from the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau stationed all over the rebel States. This estimate is made up, as he informed us, on the communications from them. He stated further that he himself, in January, passed through the southern States. He went, as I understood him to say, through Georgia, and took a tour through that country, and from his own personal observation he believed there were districts of country where there was not sufficient food to feed the inhabitants. I had supposed there were persons in all that region of country who probably out of their abundance could supply the destitute. He however stated that it was not so in some localities.

He said, moreover, that with the supplies which have been heretofore furnished through the Freedmen's Bureau to loyal refugees and freedmen they had been able to prevent any actual starvation, and he thought the appropriations already made were sufficient if no supplies were to be given to any except the loyal refugees and the freedmen, but that there was a class of people outside of those who would suffer unless they were supplied. Although I have in this body, during my whole course here, been very much disinclined to vote for what are called charitable appropriations by the Federal Government, although I do not think the Federal Government can make itself the general almoner to dispense charities all over the United States, and the localities, the towns, the counties must provide for their own poor, I think this case stands on different grounds entirely.

This country has been subjected to the desolations of war; this people is in a destitute condition; and with this testimony before us from General Howard, who has already had this matter in charge, we felt justified in reporting the resolution. The Senator from Oregon will see that General Howard has very superior opportunities for knowing the condition of the South, for the Freedmen's Bureau during the last year, through agents of his own appointment, has been supplying the destitute refugees and freedmen, and that has given him an opportunity to know the condition of things through the South. The failure of crops is not universal. That is only in particular districts. General Howard was questioned particularly about that. He says that in about half of Georgia and about half of South Carolina they have had the ordinary crop, that is, so far as they were able to plant. The crop is not what it was in former years, of course. They had not the means of putting in the usual crop; but so far as they did plant they have had the usual crop in portions of those States. But we all know, who know anything about the southern country, that they have always drawn very largely for provisions from the more northern States. In Georgia and the Carolinas they never raised all the food they consumed.

Under this state of the case, the committee, after striking down the appropriation $500,000, reported the proposition to the Senate, and I trust we may have a vote upon it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

MONARCHIES IN AMERICA.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, agreed to, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire and report upon the facts in respect to the designs of foreign Powers to impose their systems of monarchical government and institutions upon the people of this continent, and what action, if any, our Government should take to avert the inevitable consequences of the further prosecution of such designs, and to maintain for ourselves and our posterity the fundamental principles and objects of the original settlers of our country and the traditional policy of the fathers and founders of the Republic.

Resolved, That the committee be authorized and empowered to take such measures as they may judge expedient and necessary to collect and submit the facts for the information of the Government and people of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent in executive session, the doors were opened, and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 11, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON. I present a petition signed by eight hundred and thirty-seven citizens of Alexandria, headed by William H. Hodgkin. The petition asks Congress to repeal the act annexing a portion of the District of Columbia to Virginia, and goes on to state that at the recent election in Alexandria the law of Congress was openly set aside and defied. It makes a full statement in regard to that matter. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as I believe they have this subject in charge.

It was so referred.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Charles W. Wheeler and one hundred and fifty-eight others, Indiana soldiers, praying for the further equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the memorial of the grand and petit jurors of the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, praying for an increase of compensation to jurors in the courts of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the following communication:

To the honorable Senators of the United States, in Congress assembled:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, if agreeable to your honorable body, would be pleased to address both Houses of Congress, the House of Representatives concurring, on white Christian civilization in the United States of America.

At first blush, this request may seem impertinent; but pardon me, gentlemen, the times are impertinent; much of the action of the hour is impertinent. And it can vary little from the tenor of the rule that obtains to indulge the request of one of your peers, an American citizen.

Should it please your honorable bodies to grant me audience, if not incompatible with your public duties, the 16th instant will favor my convenience.

It will also be desirable that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to admit only yourselves and your families, the Executive, the heads of the different Departments and their families, ambassadors from other countries and their families, and such other white persons as you may allow.

Yours, very respectfully,

P. R. SAWYER,

of Madison county, State of Illinois.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 10, 1867.

The communication was ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That M. N. Radovich have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his memorial praying for payment for the charter of his boat Diana for the conveyance of troops, and payment for the value of said boat, it having been lost in the Government service.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of O. E. Dreutzer be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN, it was Ordered, That the memorial and accompanying papers in the case of Albert Greenleaf be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask to be excused from serving on the Committee on Pensions, on Revolutionary Claims, and Mines and Mining.

The question being put, the honorable Senator was excused.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the petition of Captain Daniel Ellis, praying for compensation for services rendered in recruiting for the Union Army in East Tennessee during the rebellion, have directed me to report it back, and recommend that it be printed without the accompanying documents. The committee departed from the usual custom in this case at the suggestion of the Senators from Tennessee, and in justice to a very gallant and meritorious officer. I ask for the present consideration of the report.

The report was agreed to.

FURNISHING EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a letter from Mr. French, late Commissioner of Public Buildings, addressed to the President of the Senate, calling his attention to the fact that in the deficiency appropriation bill there was an appropriation "to pay for completing the repairs and furnishing the Executive Mansion, $35,000," to which a proviso was attached "that no further payments shall be made on any accounts for repairing or furnishing the Executive Mansion until such accounts shall have been submitted to a joint committee of Congress and approved by such committee." He states that it is important to have that done, because there are many bills due, and the men are waiting for their pay. There does not seem to be any joint committee of Congress to which it would be appropriate to refer this matter under this provision; and the Committee on Public Buildings therefore have instructed me to report a resolution for the appointment of such a committee, which I send to the Chair, and ask to have it acted upon. I will state that having made the report by the direction of the committee, the subject being referred to us, I do not wish it be considered that it follows that the chairman of that committee, or any member of it, is to be appointed on the joint committee to attend to this business.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, and it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a joint committee be appointed, consisting of one on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to examine the claims and accounts for repairs and furnishing the Executive Mansion, and to allow and approve such as may be found justly due to the several claimants.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 40) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Paul, Minnesota, to the Missouri river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 41) authorizing the payment of the rewards offered by the President of the United States and the officers of the War Department in April and May, 1865, for the capture of Jefferson Davis; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOWE. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan whether that bill would not properly go to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. HOWARD. No.

Mr. HOWE. It is a private claim.

Mr. HOWARD. It is in the nature of a private claim undoubtedly; but it is also invested with other qualities. It is for the payment of the rewards offered by the President of the United States to the captors of Jefferson Davis and others, by public proclamation made in May, 1865. I introduced a similar bill at the former session of Congress, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I see no impropriety in its taking the same reference now that it did then, and I trust there will be no objection to it. I think the Committee on Military Affairs will be able to attend to the matter properly.

Mr. HOWE. I have no doubt of the ability of the Committee on Military Affairs to attend to it, and if the Senator from Michigan very much prefers that reference I have no sort of objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made, unless there be objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 42) to provide for the registration of electors in the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 43) further to amend an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 44) to amend an act entitled "An act to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy, and for other purposes, approved July 25, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 45) to provide for the defense of the northeastern frontier; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 46) to incorporate the National Hotel Company in the City of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 47) to provide for the adjustment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 48) to authorize the settlement of certain accounts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOWLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and he asked for its present consideration, but on motion of Mr. WILSON, it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) providing for the payment of certain Tennessee militia forces; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. RAMSEY. A few days since I introduced a bill which, inasmuch as the committees were not then organized, was laid upon the table. I now ask that that bill may be taken up and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It is with reference to the change of a railroad route in Minnesota.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 6) changing the route of a certain land-grant railroad in Minnesota was taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Shunk was taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, the following bills heretofore introduced by him were ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. No. 19) declaring a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near the town of St. Charles, and a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi river at or near the city of Louisiana, in the State of Missouri, to be legal structures and post roads;

A bill (S. No. 20) to pay bounty to certain Missouri troops who served for three years during the late war; and

A bill (S. No. 21) to provide for the construction of a military and postal railroad from Galveston, in the State of Texas, to Fort Gibson, in the Indian Territory, with a branch to Little Rock, in Arkansas.

REPORT ON INTER-OCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That of the copies of the report of Admiral Davis upon the inter-oceanic railroad and canals heretofore ordered to be printed, three hundred be furnished to the Secretary of the Navy.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. It does not increase the number, but merely diverts a part of them from the Senators to the Secretary of the Navy.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

NEW EDITION OF THE RULES.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk be directed to prepare a correct edition of the Constitution, Rules of the Senate, joint Rules of the two Houses, and the Manual, and that five hundred copies of the same be printed and bound for the use of the Senate.

PROTECTION OF SAILORS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to secure to sailors in the merchant marine service a proper supply of wholesome food and personal protection.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is hereby authorized to employ a clerk, who shall receive the same salary as the clerk of the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand copies each be printed for the use of the Senate of the following documents, to wit:

1. Report upon the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi river; upon the protection of the alluvial region against overflow; and upon the deepening of the mouths, based upon surveys and investigations made under the acts of Congress directing the topographical and hydrographical survey of the delta of the Mississippi river, &c., submitted to the Bureau of Topographical Engineers, War Department, under date of August 5, 1861, as prepared by Captain A. A. Humphreys and Lieutenant H. L. Abbott; and
2. The report of Brigadier General A. A. Humphreys on the same subject, submitted to the Secretary of War under date of May 31, 1866.

SURVEY OF BAYOU MANCHAC.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to detail an officer of the Engineer corps of the Army for the purpose of surveying Bayou Manchac, connecting with the Armitte river and leading into Lake Maurepas, and Pass Manchac connecting Maurepas and Lake Pontchartrain, and report the cost of opening said streams and bayous to first-class steamboat navigation.

SALE OF VESSELS TO BELLIGERENTS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether the selling of unarmed, unmanned vessels to belligerent Powers by American citizens is now unlawful, and whether the right to do so can be secured by legislation, and to report by bill or otherwise.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SUMNER. If there is nothing now before the Senate, I ask the Senate to be good enough to take up the resolutions submitted by me the other day, which will be found in Miscellaneous Document No. 1. I move that the Senate proceed to their consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions:

Resolutions declaring certain further guarantees required in the reconstruction of the rebel States.

1. Resolved, That Congress, in declaring by positive legislation that it possesses paramount authority over the rebel States, and in prescribing that no person therein shall be excluded from the elective franchise by reason of race, color, or previous condition, has begun the work of reconstruction, and has set an example to itself.

2. Resolved, That there are other things remaining to be done, which are as clearly within the power of Congress as the elective franchise, and it is the duty of Congress to see that these things are not left undone.

3. Resolved, That among the things remaining to be done are the four following:

First. The existing governments, which have been declared to be illegal, must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction, and will cease to exercise a pernicious influence.

Secondly. Provisional governments must be constituted as temporary substitutes for the illegal governments, with special authority to superintend the transition to permanent governments, republican in form.

Thirdly. As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

Fourthly. As the education of the people is essential to the national welfare, and especially to the development of those principles of justice and morality which constitute the foundation of republican government, and as, according to the census, an immense proportion of the people in the rebel States, without distinction of color, cannot read and write, therefore public schools must be established for the equal good of all.

Fifthly. Not less important than education is the homestead, which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

4. Resolved, That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to inquire whether those resolutions have been referred to any committee?

Mr. SUMNER. They have not been. It is not customary to refer resolutions of that character to committees. They are printed and put on the tables of Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose it is in order to refer the resolutions to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is certainly in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator from Oregon will have the goodness to suggest any reason for the reference to the Committee on the Judiciary I shall be able perhaps to answer that. His motion, I understand, is a simple motion, without any reason assigned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to hear the able speeches of the honorable Senator here in the Senate on these questions; but I am not prepared to vote for the substance of those speeches in the shape of resolutions until they have been examined by some committee and the precise meaning and effect of the resolutions determined. These resolutions, if I understand them, contain various propositions which are very important; and the Senate, by voting in favor of their adoption at this time, without due consideration, may be committed to some doctrines or views which it may not be desirable to adopt at this moment; and I think that where propositions of this general nature are introduced here that call for no practical legislation, but are the mere expression of theories in reference to the administration of public affairs, they ought to be carefully examined by some competent committee, and reported to the Senate; and if it be necessary that they should be changed or amended, they ought to be changed or amended. I am not prepared to vote on these resolutions until they have received the consideration of some committee. It is for these reasons that I make the motion.

Mr. GRIMES. It occurs to me that it would be well for the Senator from Oregon to withdraw his motion to commit until the Senator from Massachusetts can have an opportunity to explain and expound his resolutions, so that when they finally go to the committee they can go with his commentaries.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He can explain them on that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to commit is debatable.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand the Senator from Oregon, he has not made as yet any criticism on the resolution; but nevertheless he objects to our proceeding with them now; he desires a reference; he desires the aid of a committee before he proceeds with their consideration. Now, if I can have the attention of the Senator it seems to me that will be as good as a committee. The resolutions are on the table, they are plain; they are unequivocal; they are perfectly intelligible; and then, still further, they make a declaration of principle and of purpose which at this moment is of peculiar importance.

Congress has undertaken to provide for the military government of the rebel States, and it has made certain requirements with regard to reconstruction, and there it stops. It has presented no complete system, and it has provided no machinery for reconstruction. The consequence is that all our friends at the South at this moment are in the greatest possible anxiety. They are suffering. Still further, old rebels, or persons who represent the rebellion, are moving under our bill to take a leading part in reconstruction. Already the Legislature of Virginia, packed by rebels, full of the old rebel virus, has undertaken to call a convention under our recent act. Let that convention be called, and what is the condition of those friends to whom you owe protection? Unless I am misinformed by valued correspondents in different parts of Virginia their position will be very painful. I have this morning a letter from Mr. Botts—I mention his name because he is well known to all of us, and I presume he would have no objection to being quoted on this floor—in which he entreats us to go forward and provide some protection to him and others against the efforts now commenced by rebels or persons under rebel influence.

I am anxious for practical legislation to that end; but in order to pave the way for such legislation I am anxious that Congress should go forward at the earliest possible moment and make a declaration in general terms of its purposes. The Senator from Oregon says these resolutions do not propose practical legislation. I beg the Senator's pardon: they do not propose what we call legislation, but they do announce to these rebel States what we propose to do; they foreshadow the future; they give them notice; they tell the rebels that they are not to take part in this work of reconstruction; and they tell our friends and the friends of the Union that we mean to be wakeful with regard to their interests. That will be the effect of them. I say they are in the nature of a declaration. At the beginning of our war a declaration was made, which has been so often quoted in both Houses, with regard to the purposes of the war. Very often before that declarations of policy were made in one House or the other, and sometimes by concurrent resolutions of the two Chambers. If the occasion requires, the declaration ought to be made. In common times and under ordinary circumstances there would be no occasion for such a declaration; but now, at this moment, I insist that there is peculiar occasion for the declaration: you must give the notice; and the failure of your bill to meet the times throws this responsibility upon you.

The next question, then, is as to the character of the notice. It begins in its title by declaring that certain further guarantees are required in the reconstruction of the rebel States. Can any Senator doubt that certain further guarantees are required in the reconstruction of the rebel States? I submit that on that head there can be no question. I am persuaded that my excellent friend from Oregon will not question that general statement. The resolutions proceed to declare—I read the first one:

1. That Congress, in declaring by positive legislation that it possesses paramount authority over the rebel States, and in prescribing that no person therein shall be excluded from the elective franchise by reason of race, color, or previous condition, has begun the work of reconstruction, and has set an example to itself.

That is a plain proposition. Who can doubt it? Both of the principles embodied in that resolution are embodied in the recent reconstruction act, or the act, as it is entitled, for the military government of the rebel States. By that act Congress does declare its paramount jurisdiction over the whole rebel country, and it has also prescribed universal suffrage, without distinction of race or color, to be inserted in all the constitutions of these States. In doing that I say Congress has asserted a jurisdiction and given an illustration of its power which places beyond all question any further attempt in the same direction. After having asserted its jurisdiction and given the example of it which you have, you cannot hesitate to go further according to the necessities of the case. If it appear that there are other things which remain to be done, there can be no longer any question of your jurisdiction or your power. Having jurisdiction and power, then, I insist you should go forward and exercise them. It is in this spirit that the second resolution is drawn, as follows:

That there are other things remaining to be done which are as clearly within the power of Congress as the elective franchise, and it is the duty of Congress to see that these things are not left undone.

Clearly that is a truism. Then comes the next resolution, which embodies points requiring now the action of Congress:

3. Resolved, That among the things remaining to be done are the five following:

First. The existing governments, which have been declared to be illegal, must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction, and will cease to exercise a pernicious influence.

That is a plain statement. Can there be any doubt about it? You have declared these governments illegal. How, then, can you allow their continued existence? So long as they exist they are an effrontery; they exist practically in defiance of Congress. You say that they are illegal. Carry out your declaration; do not stop with a mere assertion; but make them so. You cannot make them so unless you actually vacate those governments; and I ask, sir, is it not a practical inconsistency for us to allow those governments still to exercise illegal power when all the information we have shows that they exercise it to the public evil and to the oppression of loyal Unionists, white and black? Therefore I say let the illegal governments be vacated, and let Congress make haste to declare its purpose so to do.

Secondly. Provisional governments must be constituted as temporary substitutes for the illegal governments, with special authority to superintend the transition to permanent governments, republican in form.

That point explains itself. There must be during this transition period provisional governments properly constituted that can superintend this work of reconstruction. Without it your work will fall into evil hands; it may perhaps fail. Then comes the third requirement:

Thirdly. As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

There again is the assertion of a plain principle with regard to which it seems to me there can be no question. Next:

Fourthly. As the education of the people is essential to the national welfare, and especially to the development of those principles of justice and morality which constitute the foundation of republican government, and as, according to the census, an immense proportion of the people in the rebel States, without distinction of color, cannot read and write, therefore public schools must be established for the equal good of all.

There, again, is a plain statement of an urgent duty. It will not be enough for you to give universal suffrage; you must give the essential complement to universal suffrage, universal education also; and the same power which ordained the first must, if need be, ordain the other. You have just the same power over one that you have over the other. If you can give the suffrage you can also give education; and under the circumstances one is hardly less important than the other. I have lying on my table at this moment a letter which has come this morning from an eminent citizen of Virginia, well known to most of us personally, in which he pleads in this direction. It is dated Alexandria, March 9. He says:

"Shall the southern States still be controlled by the men and the policy that have already brought ruin and disgrace, poverty and starvation, upon them; or shall they adopt the policy of the enlightened States of the North and of the nineteenth century? Shall land monopoly and class legislation, with the necessarily attending ignorance and degradation of the masses, still prevail; or shall we take a new departure from the old course, and secure universal education and free schools, with their inevitable accompaniments of enterprise, equality, wealth, temperance, morality, religion, public, private, and domestic happiness?"

I will not read further from this excellent letter, which I hold in my hand. Suffice it to say, it is all in this spirit. Can there be any doubt, sir, as to your duty in the premises? I say you have given the suffrage; you must give education also, or at least you must so legislate as to make it certain that education will be established there; you must provide for free schools open to all without any distinction of caste.

Then comes the next point of the resolutions:

Fifthly. Not less important than education is the homestead, which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

I believe that all who are now familiar with the processes of reconstruction have felt that our work would be incomplete unless in some way or other we secured to the freedmen a piece of land. It is only within a few days that gentlemen fresh from traveling through these States have assured me that nothing pressed upon their minds more, as they saw the condition of things there, than the necessity of such a provision. I believe that the more you reflect upon it, and the more you listen to evidence on the subject, the stronger will be your conclusion on that head.

Do you ask me as to the power of Congress? Again I say you find it precisely where you found the power to confer universal suffrage. To give a homestead to all these freedmen will be no more than to give them the vote. You have done the one, and now you must do the other. We are told that to him that hath shall be given, and as you have already given the ballot, that is in possession, you must go further and give, not only education, but the homestead. Nor must you hesitate for want of power. The time for hesitation has passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend a question, with his permission.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator put the granting of the ballot on the ground that without it the Government would not be republican in form, as I understood his argument.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, that was it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, I should like to know if he puts the possession by every man of a piece of land on the same ground?

Mr. SUMNER. No, I do not. I am much obliged to my friend for interposing that inquiry, for in this discussion I have no disguises.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator assimilated the two, and said that having done the one we must do the other. I supposed, perhaps, the same process of reasoning applied to both.

Mr. SUMNER. No, it was upon this process of reasoning which I think will be evident to my friend's mind: the necessity of the case, to give the land in order to complete the work of the ballot.

Mr. GRIMES. Have we not done that under the homestead law?

Mr. SUMNER. The freedmen, I know, are not excluded from the benefits of the homestead law; but my argument is that we must do something to provide them with a piece of land where they are, where they are residing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is more than we do for white men.

Mr. SUMNER. White men have never been in slavery; there is no emancipation and no enfranchisement of white men to be consummated. I put it to my friend now, I ask his best judgment, can he see a way to consummate this great and glorious work of emancipation and of enfranchisement without securing land? My friend before me [Mr. GRIMES] asks how are we going to get the land there? There are several ways. I say nothing about confiscation. Clearly by a process of confiscation we should have had ample; and I have no doubt that the country would have been better had the great landed estates at the South been divided and sub-divided among the loyal colored population. I find that that is the judgment of many Unionists at the South. I say nothing on that point; but clearly, there are lands through the South that belong to the United States, or that have fallen into the United States through the failure to pay taxes. Then, again, there is another way, which I regret to say, was not adopted, in which would be required the agency of the President of the United States. It has always seemed to me that in the exercise of the pardoning power it would have been very easy for the President to have required before the issue of a pardon that the person who was to receive it should allot a certain portion of his lands to his freedmen. That might have been annexed as a condition to the pardon. A President properly inspired and disposed to organize a true system of reconstruction, it seems to me, could not have hesitated in such a requirement. That would have been a very simple process. I am aware that Congress cannot affect the pardoning power; but still I doubt not there is something that can be done by Congress. Where Congress has done so much, I am unwilling to say that it cannot do all that the emergency requires. Let us not shrink from the difficulties. I admit, for instance, with regard to the homestead, that there may be difficulties, but not on that account should we hesitate. We must give peace and security to these people; and to that end let us consider candidly, gently, carefully what their bases are, and then fearlessly provide for them.

There is still another which I have not named in these resolutions, though I have employed it in the careful and somewhat extended reconstruction bill which I have laid on the table of the Senate, and which some time I may try to call up for discussion, and that is the substitution of the vote by ballot for the vote viva voce. Letters from Virginia and also from other parts of the South all plead for this change. They say that so long as the vote viva voce continues it will be difficult for the true Union men to organize; they will be under check and control from the rebels. I have a letter received only this morning from a Unionist, from which I will read a brief passage. He calls attention to the bill that has recently passed one of the branches of the Legislature of Virginia calling a constitutional convention under our recent congressional enactment, and he then goes on as follows:

"Under the above act all the loyal men are entirely under the control of the most malignant of the late rebel leaders. They being in power, we have no say in the matter at all except to go and cast our votes in the manner they select, which is to go and vote in the old manner, viva voce. So they can control the votes the same as ever, and if allowed to go on in that way they will control three fourths of the colored and poor white vote of the State, when, if we had the secret ballot as you have in Massachusetts, more than one half of the poor whites, those even of the rebel soldiers, would be cast in favor of the Radical Republican candidates and against their old leaders. I saw a young man, a native of Orange county, near Gordonsville, last night. He says that three fourths of the rebel soldiers would vote with us if they could do it without their neighbors knowing how they voted, especially if they could be assured of a free-school system upon the success of the Republican party. They have tried for a long time to bring the common-school system into Virginia, but have always been betrayed by the men they have trusted, and now they are ready to abandon them and vote for others if they can do so with safety. I do hope that the reconstruction act will be amended so as to insure us the secret ballot, which is our sheet-anchor of hope for the future."

I am asked who writes the letter. It is written by Jonathan Roberts, "late sheriff of Fairfax county, Virginia, when Union men were at the helm." The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] says he knows him. I believe he is a good Union man, and I am sure that he writes in a way that a good Union man might be proud to write.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him a moment? I should like to inquire if he is aware that his colleague introduced into this body last week a bill providing for all these purposes, which was referred to a committee, and is under the consideration of the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I am.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is such a bill printed and laid on the tables, providing for a system of registration and for voting by ballot. That bill was laid on our tables last week in print.

Mr. SUMNER. I take it the Senator has just come into his seat now. I had not the advantage of seeing him in his seat when I began my remarks. I think if he had listened to my remarks his inquiry would have been unnecessary. I know very well the character of the measure my colleague has introduced; but at the same time I introduced the resolutions which are under consideration; I also introduced two or three other measures tending in the same direction, and I have now in the absence of my excellent friend from Illinois, undertaken to call up for consideration one of those, and it was in the discussion upon the measure that I have called up that I made the remarks which have drawn forth the criticism of the Senator. I believe that much in these resolutions will be found in the bill of my colleague, but not all, and the two may very well go together. I stated at the outset that these resolutions were in the nature of a notification or a declaration to the country, and especially to the rebel States with regard to the purposes of Congress, and I was proceeding to review them in order to explain their character. I have read all of them except the last, which is as follows:

4. Resolved, That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

Now, does my excellent friend from Oregon, who wishes to bury this proposition in a committee, doubt that concluding resolution? Can he hesitate to say that every one of these requirements is in the nature of a guarantee, without which we shall not obtain that complete security for the future which our country has a right to expect. There they are: that the illegal governments must be vacated. Who can doubt that? That provisional governments must be constituted as temporary substitutes for the illegal governments. Who can doubt that? That the new governments must be founded on an unalterable basis of loyalty, and to that end no rebels must be allowed to exert any influence or agency in the formation of the new governments. Who can doubt that? Then again, education: who can doubt, certainly not my honorable friend from Oregon; he will not doubt the importance of education at this moment as a corner-stone of reconstruction. We have the power. It is a golden moment. Let us not fail to exercise it. Exercising it now, you can shape the destinies of that people for the future. Then, again, there is the homestead. I see the practical difficulties under that head; but I do not despair. Let us apply ourselves to them, and I do not doubt that we can secure substantially to every head of a family among the freedmen a piece of land, and we may then go further, and in the way of machinery, we can provide a vote by ballot instead of a vote viva voce.

Now, I insist that all these are in the nature of guarantees of future peace, and you ought not to hesitate in doing all within your power to secure them. I hope, therefore, that Senators will act on these resolutions without any reference to a committee. I see no occasion for a reference. There is one objection, at least, on the face; it will cause delay. Let these resolutions be adopted and go to the whole country, and my word for it you will find that the gratitude of the people of the United States and of all Union men of the South will come up to Congress for your act.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, it is only a few days, scarcely a week, since there was before this body what was called a measure of pacification, a measure of reconstruction. It was adopted. I did not, I confess, consider it a measure of pacification or a measure of reconstruction. If I were now to characterize it in the language which would express my feelings in regard to it I should scarcely be considered respectful to this body, that measure having now become a law. But, sir, it was supposed by some, and in a certain degree by me, that it was a final measure. It purported to be final; it claimed on its face to be a finality. It provided certain terms, harsh and severe in the extreme, as I thought, upon which the States formerly in rebellion should be restored to the Union. There were some who favored the measure because they feared something worse, and they thought it was better to take that than to wait until some more severe, some harsher measure should be proposed.

Now, sir, I do not regret myself that the Senator from Massachusetts has proposed these resolutions. They come, in my judgment, from the right quarter. Whatever may be my opinion of his political views, I will say for that Senator that for the last two years he has been prophetic; what he has announced, what he has declared, what he has said must be law, has become law upon many subjects. I say, therefore, these resolutions come from the right quarter; for I think it proper, I think it important, highly important, not only that the people of the South, but the people of the North should know what is coming. The people of the South are now inquiring, questioning what they shall do. I know it very well, for I have letters on my own table upon the subject. They are anxiously inquiring what course they ought now to pursue with regard to the present legislation of Congress; whether they ought to acquiesce, whether they ought to treat the measure to which I have alluded as a finality.

Under these circumstances, under this state of things, with such a law just enacted and declared to the country to be a final measure, what does the Senator from Massachusetts propose? I think it highly important that the people of this country should take note of this proposition. It is not only before the Senate, it is before the people. Let us know what is coming; let us see the worst. What I have to say at the present time will be confined mostly to the fifth proposition which the Senator has set forth in his third resolution. He has five propositions under the third resolution of the things remaining to be done. They are thus stated: First, the existing governments must be vacated and declared illegal, though the act of Congress which has already passed declares them legal, provides that they shall be continued in force as provisional governments, and, if I am not mistaken, authorizes the calling of conventions by them, and proceeding to reconstruct the government of those States under that law. Secondly, provisional governments must be constituted as temporary substitutes. The third requirement is stated in these words:

As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

I understand the Senator to say that by that he meant distinctly that the right of suffrage shall be taken from rebels in these governments; and by "rebels" we know that he means every man who ever, in any manner whatever during the four years of war, took any part in the controversy, thus excluding the whole white population from the right of suffrage, and confining it entirely, with very few exceptions, almost nominal exceptions, to the negro race. The fourth condition is the education of the people; and the fifth is in these words:

Fifth. Not less important than education is the homestead, which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

It is to that position that I desire particularly to call the attention of the Senate, and so far as I can do it of the country. What does that mean? What meaning is hidden—no, I will not say hidden—but what is meant by that form of language? It means universal confiscation in the former rebel States. That is to be the sequel and that the necessary complement, as the Senator himself says, to the action we have already taken. I have not risen for the purpose of contending against the idea of confiscation at this time. I desire merely to call attention to the fact that that is the entertainment to which we are to be invited. It seemed, I admit, to shock somewhat the Senator from Maine and some other Senators about me; and while I was very glad to find, if I understood them correctly, that they did not coincide with the views of the Senator from Massachusetts, I could not forget that two years ago I heard a Senator on this floor say that upon another subject there was not a single Senator here who agreed with the Senator from Massachusetts, and yet upon that very subject I believe every Senator on the majority side of the Senate now, if not at heart concurring with him, acts and votes with him; and I see that the time is coming when that will be the case on the question of confiscation; at least I fear it. I look with horror and regret unutterable upon this idea of confiscating the property of the people of the southern States, reducing them to starvation and poverty upon any pretext.

How are you to give the colored people of the South their homesteads? Is there public land there with which you can invest them with that property? Can you vest in them the title to your own public lands? No sir. You must go through the form of confiscation; you must strip the white people of that country of the property they now hold, and vest it in the possession of a race for whom I trust I feel as much compassion and as much pity as the Senator from Massachusetts; but I have not lost every feeling of compassion and pity for the white people of the South.

Now, sir, not to dwell on this matter, I desire to say that in my judgment it is high time that the people of this country should look upon this question. This is a question which is to be presented to them. It is to-day presented to them. Let them say what is their view I believe the time has come, or is very soon coming, when it will be necessary to take an appeal to the people of the United States upon the questions before the country. Let them settle them, and let them understand what the questions are; and therefore it is that I rejoice most heartily that the Senator from Massachusetts with his usual frankness has stated what are his views. Let them go to the country, and let the country decide.

Mr. SHERMAN. I regret, Mr. President, that the Senator from Massachusetts has thought it to be his duty to press at this session the consideration of the resolutions he offered the other day. By a solemn act of Congress, passed by three fourths of both Houses, we have said to the people of the rebel States that if they comply with certain terms and conditions they shall be restored to representation in Congress. That offer is still depending. It has been made to them by the American people through their representatives in Congress. We cannot with propriety add to the stipulations of that offer or take from them. We are bound by that proposition, reasonably bound, not, perhaps, in law, because we may vary the proposition till accepted; but we have made them a proposition, and we are bound to give a reasonable time for acceptance, and then to execute it in good faith. We have said that if they form governments republican in form, founded upon the will of the whole people, securing to all the male citizens of those States the right to participate in the elective franchise and equal rights before the law, they shall be restored to representation. That is our offer. If any legislation is needed to perfect that offer I shall vote for it with great cheerfulness. If further details are required to prescribe the form of election, the mode of voting, the registry of voters, who shall call it, when it shall be held, to prescribe the qualifications of the members of the convention, such legislation in aid of our offer would be perfectly proper. If it is necessary, in order to protect the new voters in their right to vote, to secure them the ballot, it would be perfectly competent and proper for us to so declare. We have the right to prescribe the mode and manner and form and terms by which the sense of the people of the southern States shall be ascertained. There can be no objection to such legislation either at this session or at any future time; but it seems to me it is not exactly fair or just or ingenuous to the southern people to add new terms or require of them additional guarantees as conditions to the admission of representation. These resolutions do require additional terms and guarantees not contained in the proposition submitted by Congress. I hope that those who cordially and heartily voted for that proposition will not now destroy it by passing resolutions of this kind.

Indeed, such resolutions tend to distract the mind of the people of the southern States. We all know that they are now considering whether they will accept the offer made by the Congress of the United States. Every Senator probably has received letters and telegrams from leading men in the southern States making inquiry on this subject. I have received many of them. I received one yesterday from Governor Patton, of Alabama, in which he states that he hopes and believes the people of Alabama will in good faith reform their State government under our reconstruction bill, and he makes inquiry as to the best mode of proceeding. I answered this morning that I had no doubt the proper mode would be by a direct appeal to all the people authorized to take part in the work and that probably Congress would point out specifically the mode and manner of taking their judgment. That was my individual opinion as to the proper course. We have made them this offer. We are bound to carry it out in good faith. We may prescribe the machinery or not, as we please. If it is deemed best to say that the voting at these elections shall be by ballot, well and good; no one can object. If it is said that the convention should emanate directly from the people, and not through the agency of the local Legislature, well and good. I think the best mode would be to leave details to the Legislature; but if it is the sense and judgment of Congress that the best mode of ascertaining the will of the southern people is by commencing with popular conventions, county and state, you can so prescribe. That does not change the terms of your offer; but when it is proposed to add new conditions, new stipulations, onerous burdens, we then do not act with them in a proper and ingenuous way.

They are now plowing through a difficult field. They have the prejudices of ages to overcome. They must march to the ballot-box by the side of their former slaves. Many of them are impoverished. They are wounded in their feelings, wounded in their pride. Now, sir, we ought not to make this reconstruction more difficult. I believe the public interests of this great nation demand that those States should be restored to representation, and I believe that the terms of reconstruction proposed by Congress are satisfactory to the people of this country. So far as we can gather from the newspapers and from all the evidences of public opinion, our constituents are satisfied with the offer we have made. Whatever legislation is necessary to carry it out, let us pass; but do not add to the burdens already imposed.

These resolutions contemplate confiscation. The Senator cannot avoid the inference. The fifth proposition of the third resolution contemplates the purchase of lands, or else confiscation of land. Is the Treasury now prepared to purchase homesteads for all the negroes of the southern States? If so, you must purchase them for all the poor whites also. Perhaps millions of white people in the southern States have no homesteads. Would you purchase them for the negroes and not for the whites? Where is the money to come from to make the purchase? If you do not propose to purchase, do you propose to confiscate the lands of the southern people? Is that the proposition of the Senator? If so, it is a fearful one. It would still more disorganize and revolutionize society in the southern States. It would uproot the titles to all the property in those States, and spread anarchy, discord, and civil war where God knows they have run riot long enough.

The fourth proposition is that schools ought to be established. As a mere theoretical proposition that is right enough; schools ought to be established for the education of all, white and black. A memorial which I presented the other day shows that religious and good people all over the South are now contemplating the organization of schools and academies on the New England basis, and they are asking our aid to some extent to help them in that movement. They know very well that they will be compelled by their local and State laws to educate whites and blacks. But is it now proposed by the Senators from Massachusetts that the United States as a Government should step in and aid them in educating their children, white or black? Has that ever been done in this country? Is it proposed to ingraft upon the already numerous duties of the national Government the duty of educating the people of all the United States? That has never been attempted before as one of the functions of this Government. But the Senator proposes as a condition or guarantee of reconstruction that public schools shall be established for the equal good of all. Where is the fund? Will the United States supply the fund? Have these States any public lands? Have they any resources or means or money with which now to establish a school-fund in their different States? If not, must the United States Government do it? All these are questions which are raised by the fourth proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The third proposition I do not think could have been written by him, because he generally goes directly to his propositions. The third requirement which he makes is:

As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

And yet by the bill we have passed we have stipulated that all the rebels of the southern States shall vote except a few. We have declared that those who would be disfranchised from holding office under the constitutional amendment shall not vote, but we have said that all the rest shall vote. Do you propose now to recede from that proposition? The Senator says in this resolution that no rebel influence should enter into or form a part in this reconstruction. If so, you wish to back out of the proposition that all the southern men may vote, except those disfranchised specially by the constitutional amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. I understand, for instance, that the Legislature of Virginia at this moment contains a large number of recent rebels, and yet that Legislature has undertaken to commence the work of reconstruction. Whatever is done under such influence I shall be afraid of, and I think the Senator from Ohio will be or ought to be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not afraid of and I do not object to all whom we authorize to vote taking part in this organization. Indeed, I would like to see every man, white and black, in the southern States committed to this reconstruction. If, however, rebels should attempt by the exercise of any improper power, or by the undue exercise of their old influence, or by any device, such as requiring viva voce voting, in order to exclude people from the polls, by fear or prejudice, have we not the power to check them? Must not all these proceedings pass under our supervision? Have we any fear of the Fortieth Congress? All those proceedings must come to us.

We have submitted to them in good faith an offer that if they will found their governments on the consent of the governed, all the people, white and black, upon a fair and honest basis, and frame such a constitution as we may approve, we will let them in. And we provide, in order to prevent all difficulty about it, that their proceedings shall be submitted to us. If we find that the proceedings have been unfair, have been organized by rebels with a view to exclude loyal people, we have full power over them. Can you not judge of them? Can you not set them aside if necessary, and start the work anew? But when the Senator proposes that all the disloyal shall be excluded from participation in the formation of these governments, he adds new terms and conditions which were not imposed by Congress and which were plainly rejected by us.

Mr. President, my wish in this matter is simply to stand by the proposition we have made to these people, and give them all the aids and facilities we can to reach the assent of the people, all who are invited to participate in the organization. Pass such laws in aid of your previous enactment as you see proper. Prescribe, if you please, the form of voting by ballot, the mode of organizing the convention, and all the machinery that is required. Either leave it to the people to form them in their own way and manner, or prescribe yourself; but let us not add one jot or one tittle to the stipulations contained in the offer we have made. Let us stand by it. If they, then, with the folly and madness that have ruled them heretofore reject it, it will be time enough to offer new conditions. One year ago we offered them the constitutional amendment. They repelled it with scorn; they threw it back into our faces. They have lived long enough to regret, bitterly regret, that refusal. They now feel that the men who passed the reconstruction law are masters of the situation, that there is no power to defy their authority or overrule their dictation, whatever it may be. They feel now that they must assent to the conditions imposed upon them by Congress. They are now coming up to that work. I believe they will organize in all these southern States in pursuance of that law; that they will base their governments upon the assent of the people, black and white; that they will do it in good faith. We have made them the offer; let them have a fair trial. If they should by fraud, or by the old fear by which they have kept a whole race in bondage, prevent them from sharing in that political power which we have given to them, we can hereafter protect the black people and the white people of the southern States. In the mean time we are bound, it seems to me, by every consideration of prudence, by every dictate of statesmanship, by every sentiment of honor, not to change the terms of our offer in any material respect until they have either accepted it or rejected it.

That is the view I take of the matter, and with that view I shall vote against all propositions to change materially the offer we have made, or to touch it in any way, except so far as to provide the machinery necessary to enable them without dispute to pass upon the offer we have given them. I have glanced over the bill introduced by the Senator's colleague, and I believe that with but slight modifications it would be a wise measure. It is just such a measure as many of the southern people want. They want to know exactly what we desire. They want us to prescribe the machinery by which they shall act, and that bill does it, I think; without adding to them any further burdens. After it has passed the inspection of the Judiciary Committee, I have no doubt I shall give it my hearty support as an aid to the law we recently passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise principally, Mr. President, to remark upon a proposition made by the honorable member from Connecticut, which I am apprehensive, unless it be corrected, is calculated to do mischief to a section of the country which I am sure he desires to serve. I understood the honorable member to say that from the experience of the past he was satisfied that the Senate of the United States and the other branch of Congress would sooner or later adopt this measure, because it was proposed by the honorable member from Massachusetts, they having, according to his view, heretofore followed sooner or later in the track which he pointed out for them. I have no idea that that will be found true in this instance. I will not stop to inquire if it has been true in the past. I have confidence in the Senate of the United States, absolute confidence (and it was upon that confidence that I gave the vote which I did upon the bill which has now become a law) that they would adhere to their pledged faith, that they would not only set an example to themselves, but an example to all that the pledged faith of a nation was to be observed. I thought I saw in opinions which I believed were entertained by the honorable member from Massachusetts, and a few others who concur with him, that if the measure then before the Senate was not adopted, harsher, much harsher measures would in the end be exacted of the South; and I believed that the South would accept the measure that has been before this body. That belief is strengthened by a correspondence of considerable extent with many of the leading men of that section. I have before me now upon my table letters from some of them in North Carolina, and all that they wish to know is whether in my judgment what Congress has offered will, if accepted by the South, end the controversy. I have assured them that it would, in speech and by letter; and I trust I shall not be placed in the situation of proving in fact false to my own opinion; above all, that I shall not be placed in that situation by the Senate of the United States or by Congress, upon whose pledged word I acted.

I suppose that there is not within the sound of my voice upon this floor any member, and that there are not to be found on the other floor many, who do not desire to see the South restored. I suppose the honorable member from Massachusetts is not an exception. I have heard him more than once announce to us that he shared in the solicitude that the South should be restored. And yet after he, as I suppose, concurred in the measure which the Senate adopted—for it came to us in such a way that I imagine it received the sanction of the gentlemen of the Senate with whom I do not act politically—and when above all he did not vote against it, I supposed he was willing that the question of restoration or not should be placed upon the acceptance or the rejection of that measure; and now, before the South have had an opportunity to express any opinion upon the subject officially, although every member of the Senate, I suppose, has received letters, stating their desire to accept it if it is to be a final settlement of the question, the honorable member proposes resolutions, one of which looks to a result which I feared might be the consequence of the rejection of it—confiscation.

Mr. President, whatever feelings we may have entertained toward the southern citizens, is it not enough to satisfy us all that they have been punished, punished in the position in which they have brought themselves? It may be a visitation of Providence upon them. Providence may have thought proper to render them for the moment insane; and Providence has punished them so as effectually to cure them of that insanity; and they are now anxious to be again in our midst, sharing in our prosperity, participating in our power, taking a part in the administration of this Government. Does the honorable member from Massachusetts suppose that the loyal men, as he terms them, of the South and the freedmen will not be safe under the provisions of the bill which we have already passed, with the military in supreme power, and with a provision that no constitution which they shall adopt shall become operative unless it receives the subsequent sanction of Congress? Does he suppose these two safeguards against usurpation and tyranny, if usurpation and tyranny upon the part of the South toward the class to which he has adverted are to be anticipated, would not be effectual to prevent them? But look at the other result. If the honorable member's terms are to be adopted, the South will come back by the vote of the blacks just emancipated, and the vote of some three or four thousand men calling themselves loyal men, many of whom in the beginning were secessionists, and the intelligence, the virtue, the refinement of the South is to be neglected. It is to be converted into a San Domingo, and just as sure as that God is above us, if it comes to that, armies will not be able to prevent the horrors consequent upon that condition.

I implore the Senate, therefore, to adhere in good faith to the measure which they have adopted. I regret (although I thought otherwise at the time) that the South did not accept the constitutional amendment. I regret many things that they have done, but offer them this mode of rescuing themselves from the desolation in which they are placed; and I believe, as I believe in my existence, that they will accept it, and that in a year or two all will be as it was before the rebellion commenced.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Four points of these resolutions are entirely met by the bill submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and which has been before the Committee on the Judiciary. That provides for voting by ballot. The first proposition in these resolutions is that "the existing governments, which have been declared to be illegal, must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction."

The bill to which I have referred provides that they shall have no agency in the work of reconstruction. It provides that the commander of the district shall have a registration made, and shall manage the whole subject of reconstruction; so that the difficulty which the honorable Senator apprehends from the Legislature of Virginia is entirely removed.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask my friend if that bill has yet become a law?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That bill has not become a law, but it was laid on our tables. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee. It is now being acted upon in the House, and will be immediately acted upon here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. These resolutions cannot accomplish anything if they are passed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. These resolutions of course will not have the least effect in accomplishing anything. They are a mere declaration of what ought to be. The law is a declaration of what shall be, and the bill to which I have referred is an enabling act enabling the South, without the interference of rebels or their influence, under the control of the commander appointed by the Federal Government, to form new State organizations. These resolutions do contain something more: they contain a declaration that education shall be secured to the freedmen; that land must be secured to the freedmen. But it is the fourth resolution to which I do most seriously object:

Resolved, That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

The effect of these resolutions is to say that unless we secure education to the freedmen, unless we secure lands to the freedmen, the country cannot be reconstructed; that we must exact that. In other words, we are called upon by the adoption of these resolutions actually to abrogate and annul all that we have been trying to do in Congress for the last three months. I object to it as unfair to Congress and unfair to the country. I believe that the proposition that Congress has put forth was put forth in good faith. I believe that it is a finality upon the basis of which law and order and equal rights will be secured to every man in this country. The dominant party of the country have received it with approbation; the South are about adopting it; and just at the most critical point of time the Senate of the United States are called upon to vote that they are not in earnest, but that they will repeal all the action they have taken and insist upon the guarantee of education and land to the freedmen. I move that the resolutions be laid upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion to give me an opportunity to say a word.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will withdraw it for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey withdraw the motion?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir, to give the Senator an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. SUMNER. I find that the objects which I seek to accomplish in reconstruction are regarded in very different lights by myself and by Senators who have spoken. The Senator from New Jersey, the Senator from Maryland, and the Senator from Ohio, all regard these requirements as in the nature of burdens. Education is a burden; a homestead is a burden. It is a new burden which I am seeking, so these distinguished Senators argue, to impose upon the South. Are they right, or am I right? Education can never be a burden. Justice in the way of a homestead can never be a burden. Each is a sacred duty which our Government owes to those who have the right to look to us for protection.

Now, at this moment, in the development of events, the people at the South have a right to look to us for protection. They have a right to look to us that, in laying the basis of future security, we shall see that those things are done which will make the security real, and not merely nominal. And yet, when I asked that the security shall be real and not merely nominal, I am encountered by the objection that I seek to impose new burdens. Sir, if I know my own heart, I would not impose a burden upon any human being. I would not impose a burden even upon those who have trespassed so much against the Republic. I do not seek their punishment. Never has one word fallen from my lips in any of the debates in this Chamber asking for their punishment, for any punishment of the South. All that I ask is the establishment of human rights on a permanent basis of security. Is there any Senator who differs from me in that demand? I am sure that my friend from Ohio does seek the establishment of future security; but he will allow me to say that to my mind he abandons it at the beginning; he fails at the proper moment to require those guarantees without which your future security will be vain.

This is not the first time that the Senator from Ohio has set himself against the fundamental propositions of reconstruction. When, now more than four years ago, I had the honor of introducing into this Chamber a proposition declaring the jurisdiction of Congress over this whole question, and over the whole rebel region, I was met by the Senator from Ohio, who reminded me that I was alone, and he went forward to say that my position was not unlike that of Jefferson Davis. His remarks were made as long ago as April 2, 1862. I will send them to the Chair to be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"I therefore cannot help but say that while I respect the motives of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, while I give him credit for consistency, ability, and a great deal of culture, and am always glad to hear him speak, yet I must confess that when I looked over his resolutions they struck me with surprise and regret. They would revolutionize this Government. Sir, strike the States out of this system of Government, and your Government is lost and gone. I cannot conceive of the United States governing colonies and provinces containing millions upon millions of people, black and white. I do not think such a thing can exist. I do not believe it is in the power of secession to bring us to such a state of things. I can draw no distinction between the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts and the doctrines that are proclaimed by Jefferson Davis. If a State can secede, the people of the State can make a new government. If the people of South Carolina are firm and united in their policy, which no man doubts; if they have power to secede, they have seceded and their doctrine is true. But I do not believe they have the power to secede. They may go into banishment, wandering all over the face of the earth; but they cannot take with them a single foot of the soil of this country over which our flag ever floated. The doctrine of the Senator from Massachusetts is substantially an acknowledgment of the right of secession, of the right to secede. He, however, puts the States in the condition of abject Territories, to be governed by Congress. Jefferson Davis puts it in the power of the people of the States to govern the States themselves. As to which is the most dangerous or obnoxious doctrine I leave every man to determine."—Congressional Globe, Thirty-Seventh Congress, second session, page 1495.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not called the attention of the Senate to these remarks in any unkind feeling, for I certainly have none for the Senator; I have no feeling but kindness and respect for him; but as I listened to him a few minutes ago remonstrating against the position I now occupy I was carried back to that early day in 1862, when he remonstrated, if possible more strenuously, against the position that I then occupied; and what was it? I had had the audacity to assert the paramount power of Congress over the whole rebel region. That was the sum and substance of my argument; and you have the answer of the Senator from Ohio to it. And now in the lapse of time the Senator from Ohio has ranged himself by my side, and has voted for that measure of reconstruction which is founded on the jurisdiction of Congress over this whole rebel region.

As time went on the subject assumed another character. It was with regard to the suffrage question. A year ago I ventured to assert on this floor that we must give the suffrage to all colored persons by act of Congress and without any constitutional amendment. I founded myself in that assertion on two positions. One was the solemn guarantee in the Constitution of a republican form of government; and I undertook to show that any denial of rights on account of color was unrepugnant to such an extent that the Government that sanctioned it could not be considered in any just sense republican in any form. And I then went further and insisted that from the necessity of the case at the present moment Congress must give the suffrage to all persons at the South without distinction of color. I argued that the suffrage was needed in order to counterbalance the suffrage of the rebels. Very well. One year has passed, and you have now, by act of Congress, asserted the very power which the Senator from Ohio and other distinguished Senators associated with him most strenuously denied. That Senator and other Senators insisted that it could only be done by constitutional amendment. I insisted that it could be done under the existing text of the Constitution; nay more, that from the necessity of the case it must be done. Very well; you have done it.

But in doing it unhappily you have failed to make proper provision for enforcing this essential security. You have provided no machinery in your act, and you have left other things undone which ought to be done. And now, as I come forward here and urge that these things should be done, I am encountered again by my friend from Ohio whom I had encountered before on these other cardinal propositions; and he now, just as strenuously as before, insists that it is not within our power or province at this moment to make any additional requirements of the rebel States. He is willing that the bill in certain particulars shall be amended; I do not know precisely to what extent he would go on that head; but he will make no additional requirements, as he expresses it, in the nature of burdens. Sir, I make no additional requirements in the nature of burdens. I have already said I impose no burdens upon any man; but I do insist upon the protection of rights. And now at this moment, as we are engaged in this great work of reconstruction, I insist that your work shall be completely done. It will not be completely done if you fail to supply any safeguards or precautions that can possibly be adopted.

A great orator told us on one occasion that he had one lamp by which his steps were guided, and that was the lamp of experience. There is one great experience on this question, commanding, historic, which illumines this age. It is more than a lamp: it is like the sunshine. It is the example afforded to us in that great act of emancipation by the Emperor of Russia when he set free twenty million serfs. Did he stop merely by giving them their freedom? No! he went further, and provided for their education, and also provided that each should have a piece of land. And now when I ask that my country, a Republic, heir of all the ages, foremost in the tide of time, should do on this question only what the Emperor of Russia has done, I am met here by grave Senators with the argument that I am imposing new burdens upon late rebels. No, sir, it is no such thing. I am only asking new securities for my country, to the end that it may be safe, great, and glorious.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator sought to weaken my arguments by showing that at some time or other I changed my mind he could readily do it. Every reasoning man in the progress of this war has changed his mind upon many questions; and the Senator is not an exception, but he is very unfortunate in his illustration. The language he has caused to be read which I used, I do not know on what occasion, it seems in April, 1862, I could repeat now, and heartily indorse upon the fundamental proposition then stated: I certainly stand now as I did then. I state now that those ten rebel States are in the Union of the United States, have been recognized to be in the Union from the beginning of the war by every department of the Government, executive, legislative, and judicial. They are imperishable, and neither the hand of the Senator from Massachusetts nor the hand of any other mortal man can strike them from the list of States of the Union. That is the substance of the doctrine which he has caused to be read. I have no doubt that nine tenths of this Senate could read with approbation the remarks that he has quoted from a speech that I made four years ago; that is, that these States are still in the Union; that the Union is indestructible, imperishable; and that neither war nor legislation can strike them from the list of States. But, according to the doctrine proclaimed by the Executive and sanctioned by Congress, the civil governments in those States have been overthrown by the rebellion—

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; that was my original position, to which the Senator replied in the passage that I have read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never took issue on that proposition. On the contrary, in the very speech quoted I say that the civil government has been overthrown by the rebellion, that the civil governments had been usurped by traitors, and that we were endeavoring to break down by arms these men who had usurped the government of those States. The same doctrine is contained in the very speech that he read, and I say that now. It was the doctrine finally adopted by the President of the United States when he issued his proclamation to the people of North Carolina, and repeated to the people of the other southern States, recognizing them as States, but declaring that the rebellion had overthrown civil governments, and then proposed to reorganize civil governments in those States. That is the doctrine upon which we all stand now, and upon which the recent reconstruction bill was founded. We propose to start again civil governments founded upon universal suffrage in those States, and we have declared that that government shall be founded upon the consent of all the people of those States without regard to race, previous condition, or color.

But now, sir, after we have made that offer, after we have made that stipulation, the Senator, before these people have had an opportunity to act upon it, proposes to revoke that offer and make another one still more onerous in its conditions. He says that it is not onerous or burdensome to take from them their land and distribute it among the former slaves. Why, sir, does such a law exist in Massachusetts? In Massachusetts wealth has been accumulated in untold fortunes. Half a dozen men in Massachusetts could buy out whole counties in the State of Ohio. Does the Senator propose in Massachusetts, in order to make it republican, to scatter these great fortunes among the poor people of Massachusetts? Are there not thousands of men in Massachusetts now without homesteads or homes? Are there not now in Boston wanderers, white and black, of all conditions, starving for food perhaps, or depending upon the charity of their neighbors? Are there not poor people in Massachusetts as well as rich? Does the Senator propose to seize the property of the rich and scatter it among the poor in order to secure a republican government for the State of Massachusetts? That is the proposition contained in these resolutions?

Now, sir, because I am not willing to do that, because I am not willing to uproot society in all these States more than it has been uprooted, because I am willing to stand by the offer we have made, I am to be chided by the Senator from Massachusetts for being backward. No plan of confiscation has been carried out in Europe since the time when the Norman invaded England and divided the lands of the Saxons among the Norman barons, and all the civil wars in England for five hundred years grew out of that conquest.

The case mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts of the autocrat of all the Russias is not an exception. There the landowner was paid for his property by the former serfs, and the adjustment was made with the consent of the landholder, and the arrangement was for their mutual advantage. But even if it were not so; suppose the autocrat of all the Russias had seized upon the property of his subjects and divided it among those who had it not before, is that an example for the American Congress to follow? Have we any right or authority to commit such acts here? Is this a Government like Russia, where the whole Government rests upon the will of the sovereign, where he may destroy life and property, banish, murder, or execute at his pleasure to carry out his will? Is that the foundation-stone upon which the Senator would organize governments in all those southern States? I say not.

But, Mr. President, it is not worth while for us to pursue this argument. The only question is, whether we are willing substantially to abide by the offer we made only a few days ago to the people of the southern States. The Senator says that a year ago I and other Senators here opposed the extension of the elective franchise to the negro population of the South. In that he is mistaken so far as I am concerned, because I never took any position on the subject—never said anything about it. I had no doubt of our right to impose terms and conditions upon the people of the southern States. The constitutional amendment was adopted after a long and serious debate, and I believe without my participating in it at all. But a year ago I was not in favor of extending enforced negro suffrage upon the southern States. I voted for the constitutional amendment; but that very amendment made a provision that would have secured gradually to all the negroes of the southern States the elective franchise, by making it the obvious interest of all the white people to extend the suffrage. It was adopted after grave and serious debate and consideration, and was heartily approved by our constituents. But, sir, the South rejected it. These people still hugged to their bosom the same delusive spirit which led them into the rebellion. They believed that by the defection of the President of the United States they were masters of the situation. They believed they could rally around the President and make a party that would let them in on better terms. They have now found out their sad mistake. They are now ready and willing to come on such terms and conditions as we have offered them. Shall we now add new conditions and new stipulations not contained in our constitution of any of the States? Shall we destroy and derange property in every southern State, and impose conditions that have not been required of any other State in the United States? That is the only question.

I say, therefore, that under the circumstances by which we are surrounded, this proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts and this whole debate is injurious to the public interests, because it retards the great process of reconstruction, which is going on very well.

I said I was in favor of the bill proposed by his colleague. Why? Because it did not materially change in any essential particular the offer we have made; because it is not in the slightest degree inconsistent with the proposition we have made; but it prescribed a definite machinery by which the will of the people of the southern States could be ascertained. It provides for a registration, not adding to or taking from a single voter who could vote under the reconstruction law. It simply provides that they are to be ascertained by a registration. It then provides, in order to secure a fair expression from every male citizen, for the ballot. It does not add to nor take from the number who shall vote. It provides that they may vote if they choose by ballot. That is right and in pursuance of the terms of that law. It also provides that the rebel Legislature or provisional government shall not take part in the machinery. That I did not deem very material, because the law itself contemplated that it should be a movement of the people, "that when the people of any one of those States shall have organized a government," and we reserved to ourselves the right to say when this condition had been complied with. I would much prefer it if the mode and manner and machinery by which this organization is to be effected was pointed out. There can be no objection to such a law; but that is a very different proposition from the one now made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I trust, therefore, that this subject may be laid aside, and that we may proceed to finish the business we have before us at the present session, provide if it is necessary the machinery by which the assent of these people may be obtained, and that then we may go back to our homes among our constituents, where they desire us to go.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I had not until this morning read the string of resolutions submitted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and knew nothing about them. His earnestness in their discussion has induced me to give them some little attention, and as I may be called upon to vote upon them, I wish to state as briefly as possible, the views I entertain. The resolutions themselves do not contemplate any immediate practical legislation by this body. They are in the nature of theses for discussion here, introduced for the purpose, doubtless, of eliciting our opinions upon the various topics presented; and as the Senate seems to have very little else to do just now, I am not sure but that we may spend a few minutes profitably in discussing these abstract theses.

He begins by declaring that Congress has commenced a good work in the passage of the reconstruction act passed by the two Houses a few days ago. I agree to that; I voted for it; and now I will ask the honorable Senator whether he did not vote for the reconstruction act?

Mr. SUMNER. I voted for the amendments as they came from the House. I did not vote for the act as it passed the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me proceed further. Did the honorable gentleman vote at all upon the final passage of the bill? Did he oppose it in any way, by speech or influence? Did he seek to obstruct its passage in any form whatever? I think he did not.

I agree that in passing that reconstruction bill Congress did a good work. So far then we agree.

The second resolution is—

That there are other things remaining to be done which are as clearly within the power of Congress as the elective franchise, and it is the duty of Congress to see that these things are not left undone.

Doubtless there are many things remaining for Congress to do that are not embraced in the reconstruction act; but about which it is unnecessary for me to speak now.

His third resolution declares—

That among the things remaining to be done, are the five following:

First. The existing governments, which have been declared to be illegal, must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction, and will cease to exercise a pernicious influence.

Well, sir, if I am correctly informed there is a bill pending in the other House, which if passed by that and by this House will effectually vacate these alleged illegal governments; and I see no necessity of declaring here just at this time the necessity of passing such a bill. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When such a measure shall be presented to the Senate for discussion it will receive our full and candid consideration. I do not deem it necessary to spend the time of the Senate in discussing that abstract proposition.

There are, however, several things which the Senator in his resolutions declares ought to be done to which I wish to pay the respect of a passing observation. The first of any prominence is this:

As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

I do not agree to this proposition of the honorable Senator. The reconstruction act to which I have referred is in itself a plain, authentic, solemn declaration of Congress as to who may and who may not exercise the elective franchise, both in the calling of conventions for the reformation of their State constitutions, and in reference to the exercise of the elective franchise under those constitutions after they shall have been adopted by the people of those States and ratified and approved by Congress. We have made, I say, a distinct and clear proposition to the people of the rebel States; and what is that proposition? It is this:

And when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for election of delegates, and when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification who are qualified as electors for delegates, and when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same, and when said State by a vote of its Legislature elected under said constitution shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, and when said article shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding sections of this bill shall be inoperative in said State.

Now, sir, the regulation of the elective franchise under this reconstruction act is clear and intelligible. It declares to the South that all male persons, twenty-one years old, who are not within the restrictions contained in the article of the amendment known as the fourteenth article, shall have the right to vote in the election of delegates to a convention in each State to reform its constitution; and it also declares that the same class of persons shall henceforth under the State constitution, as thus reformed, have the right of voting at the polls. Who are those persons? The entire southern male population, both white and black, who are not excluded by the article of amendment which we adopted at the last session. We all know that a very large proportion of the white population thus allowed the privilege of voting in the southern States were rebels during the war and bore arms against the country. At the time of the passage of the reconstruction act we knew this; we know it still; and yet we have proposed, in the form of legislation, that this same class of persons shall for the future have the right to vote on complying with the conditions we annex to the act itself. What, then, does this proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts imply?

As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

"Every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments." Will the honorable Senator declare that the votes of rebel soldiers and rebel officers, not excluded by the amendment, are not "rebel influence" at the South? What construction does he put upon this portion of his resolution? Is it not directly and by the clearest intendment aimed against that entire portion of the white southern population? I take it he will not deny that his object is the complete disfranchisement of every man in the South who has participated in the rebellion and in whose heart there are still lurking sentiments of the old disloyalty which drove him to arms. If the gentleman does not mean this by his language, then I submit that it has no meaning at all, and his proposition is unworthy of discussion. It is aimed at something; it is aimed at somebody. What is the something and who is the somebody unless such as I have described? If I have misconstrued this part of the Senator's resolution I should be glad to be corrected, for I look upon it as important. He does not correct me.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, yes; I must contradict you.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. At the same time that I laid these resolutions on the table I also laid a bill of twenty sections entitled—

Mr. HOWARD. We are not acting upon the Senator's bill, but upon these resolutions.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that; but if the Senator will allow me, I laid a bill on the table entitled "A bill to guarantee a republican form of government in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, and to provide for the restoration of these States to practical relations with the Union;" and in that bill I laid down the rules with regard to the elective franchise in such a way as I thought would exclude all rebel agency or influence; but my bill does not proceed on the idea which the Senator imagines of the disfranchisement of all soldiers who took part in the rebellion.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know upon what principle the bill proceeds.

Mr. SUMNER. I will explain it by and by.

Mr. HOWARD. All I know is the record before me and the language which the Senator uses in his resolution, and from reading it I took it for granted that such was his aim. Now, sir, I never can agree to any such principle. We have made an honest, out-and-out proposition to the southern people, black and white, proposing to them the means by which they can restore themselves to participation in the Government of the United States as States of the Union; and for one, sir, I am for keeping the pledge. It was made deliberately, and I shall be the last man to violate the pledge or to attempt to retract it.

Nor will I attempt to superadd to this act of reconstruction conditions which we did not impose at the time and which the bill itself does not contemplate; because that would be equally a departure from that uberrima fides which alone becomes the Senate of the United States and the legislation of Congress on a subject so grave, so important.

I am not in favor of confining the suffrage in the southern States to black men solely. I recognize at the South a white population as well as a black population; and although I would go as far as any man to subdue completely the spirit of the rebellion and resistance to the just authority of the United States, I cannot go so far as to attempt to set up a government in any of those States which is based exclusively upon the votes of black persons, and which in its operations is not to be meddled with or in any way controlled by white persons that may have happened to participate in the rebellion. In short, I look upon the white man of the South as entitled to at least as great rights as the black man, if his character be equally good. But it is sufficient for me that we have held out this pledge to the southern States and people; we have proposed our own conditions; and I will not at this early period of time undertake to change them or to modify the proposal, nor until the people of the southern States have had an opportunity to consider and act upon the terms.

Now, sir, the Senator proposes, in addition to what the reconstruction act contains, that "public schools must be established for the equal good of all."

I see no necessity for discussing this question. The people of the southern States are to frame their new constitutions; they are to institute new governments depending upon the public sentiment of each of the States; and these constitutions cannot go into operation until each has been submitted to Congress for its examination and approval. It can have no operation until it has received our sanction. We are to pass upon each one of them, and if we find any material defect in it, either in respect to education or any other subject-matter properly within the scope of State legislation, it will be for us to remand the constitution to the people for amendment, so as to make it conform to our own views.

Another proposal is that the head of every family shall be provided with a homestead. The language of the Senator is:

Not less important than education is the homestead, which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

How is this land to be obtained? Where does it lie? Who owns it? Who occupies it? And if it is to be taken from its present occupants and turned over to a freedman who happens to be the head of a family there must be some machinery by which the thing is to be done. Is it to be taken through the confiscation act? Certainly not. The Senator from Massachusetts knows as well as I that that act is but little better than a dead letter. We have heard of but very few condemnations of land under the confiscation act of 1862. Does he expect that the land is to be thus confiscated to the Government under that act by wholesale, and then parceled out among the heads of families? Is that his project? Or does he contemplate that the head of every family of freedmen shall have the privilege of establishing himself upon a homestead in a new country upon public land of the United States? If that be his idea, it is already carried out in our legislation. It is as much the right of a freedman to locate himself upon a homestead upon the public lands of the United States as of a person who is not a freedman, so that in this view of the case it is entirely nugatory and without utility. He says further in his proposition:

That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

My reply to this is: we have already proposed the terms of what we agree to be a just reconstruction; let us manfully and honestly and courageously adhere to them, and if we find in the future that they are not accepted by the rebel States, or that there is any other embarrassment in the way, it will be time then to resort to further legislation upon the subject; but at present I am opposed to voting upon this series of abstract propositions which can eventuate in nothing and have in contemplation, so far as I can see, no practical legislation and no practical end. I shall therefore at the proper time move to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["Oh no; let us dispose of the resolutions."]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to lay the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Howe, Morton, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Morrill of Maine, Nye, and Riddle—7.

So the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint Committee to Examine the Accounts for Repairs and Furnishing the Executive Mansion, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of July 28, 1866, a report of the Secretary of State, with the correspondence between the United States and Governments of France and Prussia, since March 4, 1867, touching the claim of those Governments to the military service of persons born in those countries but who subsequently became naturalized citizens of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that message be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is so very voluminous that I do not venture now to ask that it shall be printed without a reference.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, calling for information as to the sending out of any armed expedition against the Indians of the western Territories; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

FURNISHING EXECUTIVE MANSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint committee, to consist of two members of the Senate, and three members of the House, be appointed to examine the accounts for repairs and furnishing the Executive Mansion, as provided for in the act making appropriations for deficiencies, &c., approved March 2, 1867.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution. It is the same in substance as one passed by the Senate this morning.

The resolution was concurred in; and the President pro tempore being authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate, Messrs. HARLAN and NORTON were appointed.

DONAHUE, RYAN, AND SECOR.

Mr. NYE. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) for the relief of Donahue, Ryan & Secor, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and I ask for immediate action upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That resolution appropriates something like two hundred thousand dollars I think. I believe it ought to lie on the table so that we may see it and consider it.

Mr. NYE. I hope it will be proceeded with now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not mean to make a motion to lay the measure on the table, but I suggest that it ought not to be acted upon the day it is reported from the committee, but should lie on the table a day for consideration, as the rules require.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution can only be considered to-day by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have received, and been requested to present, a petition signed by several hundred officers and soldiers, seamen, and marines, stating that under the bounty act which was passed persons are excluded from the benefits of that act who enlisted at the beginning of the rebellion, in 1861 and 1862, and were discharged on account of disability before serving two years. They state that those persons do not receive bounty at all, and are deserving persons; and they ask that the bill which was introduced by a Representative from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] in the House of Representatives, may receive favorable consideration, extending the benefits of the bounty to that class of persons. The petition is numerous signed, and is headed by the signature of Colonel Knobelsdorff, late colonel of the forty-fourth regiment of Illinois volunteers. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 11, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider. Under this call joint resolutions of the Legislature of a State or Territory may be presented.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

EXTENSION OF BOUNTY LAW.

Mr. PERHAM introduced a bill to extend the provisions of the bounty law to the widows and children of soldiers who enlisted for nine months and were killed in battle; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; when appointed.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I desire to state that this bill differs from the bill passed by this House at the last Congress. That bill provided for the construction of this work by a company to be incorporated by Congress. This provides for the construction of the work by the Government at the public expense under the direction of the Secretary of War. Some of the friends of the measure desire that this bill shall be referred to a select committee. I therefore move its reference to a select committee of five.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to my colleague that this bill had better be referred either to the Committee on Commerce or to the Committee on Military Affairs. It relates peculiarly to the commercial and the military interests of the country, and I can see no propriety in raising a select committee to take this subject out of the hands of a regular standing committee having appropriately jurisdiction of the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rules bills introduced during the morning hour must be referred without debate. The Chair has, however, indulged both gentlemen from New York in a brief statement.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I hope I may be allowed to make a single additional suggestion. In the Senate this measure has always been referred to the Committee on Commerce; and I hope my colleague will consent that it shall be referred either to the corresponding committee of this body or to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask the gentleman to indicate which of these standing committees he prefers. If he insists on the reference to a select committee, then I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. If I may be allowed I should like to say a word. In the Thirty-Seventh Congress this was referred to a select committee; and a like reference was made in previous Congresses. It is a matter of great national importance. I hope, therefore, the motion of my colleague will not prevail, and that the subject will be referred to a select committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It has never been referred to a select committee in the Senate, but has always been referred to a standing committee.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to a standing committee takes precedence.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. PERHAM. Is this matter debatable? The SPEAKER. It is not, but any other reference can be moved.

Mr. PERHAM. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when appointed.

Mr. MILLER. I hope that will not be done; it will be the death of the bill.

The question first recurred on referring the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when appointed.

Mr. MILLER demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

There being no further bills and joint resolutions under the call of States and Territories, the Speaker announced that the remainder of the morning hour would be consumed in calling the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Pennsylvania, where the call rested on the 6th of March, the pending question being the consideration of the following resolution, introduced by Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania:

Resolved That the tariff bill, being House bill No. 718 of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, together with the pending amendments, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I introduced that same bill this morning and had it referred. I therefore beg leave to withdraw the resolution.

No objection was made, and the resolution was withdrawn.

AGRICULTURAL REPORTS.

Mr. MILLER submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred under the law to the Committee on Printing, when appointed:

Whereas during the late war none of the Agricultural Reports were distributed in the rebellious States; and whereas since the peace there is a great demand for them by loyal people engaged in agricultural pursuits in that section of the country; and whereas it is to the interest of the Government that the agricultural interests should be encouraged in every section of the country; and whereas the Committee on Printing have recommended in a resolution which was adopted by this House the printing of the same number of the Reports as were ordered to be printed of the Report of the year 1865, which are entirely inadequate to meet the legitimate demands of the people engaged in this pursuit: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and are hereby, requested to order fifty thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for 1866 to be printed in addition to those recently ordered by the House, twenty thousand for the use of the Agricultural Department, and the balance for the use of the members of this House for distribution.

Resolved, That the proposition that the war debt of the country should be extinguished by the generation that contracted it is not sanctioned by sound principles of national economy, and does not meet the approval of this House.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the previous question shall not be seconded will it be in order to move to refer this resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed?

The SPEAKER. That motion will then be in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the call for the previous question will not be seconded. I do not think it is proper to commit the House to the doctrine enunciated by this resolution without some investigation by a proper committee.

The question was taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division, there were—ayes 26, noes 55.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed; and upon that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL EXAMINERS FOR PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. MYERS. Under the call of States for resolutions is it in order to introduce a bill?

The SPEAKER. Under the call of States for resolutions, bills or anything else can be introduced and acted upon without debate, under the operation of the previous question; except that if the bill contains an appropriation, and the point of order is made, it must be referred to the Committee of the Whole. If the previous question should not be seconded, and the bill gives rise to debate, then it will go over, as a simple resolution would, under the rule.

Mr. MYERS. I then introduce a bill to increase the force in the Patent Office, and for other purposes; and if there is no serious opposition I shall ask that the bill be acted upon now.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The bill was then read at length. The first section provides that the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to appoint, from time to time, in the manner already provided for by law, such an additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners as may be required to transact the current business of the office with dispatch; provided the whole number of such additional examiners shall not exceed four of each class, and that the additional annual expenses of the Patent Office shall not exceed its annual receipts.

The second section provides that the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to appoint, by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, a solicitor of the Patent Office, who shall be considered its law officer, whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum, to be paid from the patent fund, and whose duty it shall be to render all reasonable aid in the transaction of the business of said office that may be required of him by the said Commissioner.

The third section provides that the salary of the first assistant examiners and disbursing clerks shall be $2,000 per annum; and the salary of the librarian shall be $2,500, which shall be in full for his services as translator and librarian.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think this bill should receive the consideration of a committee, and not be acted upon now.

The SPEAKER. If the bill gives rise to debate it will go over under the rule.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to debate the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] having introduced the bill is entitled to the floor upon it.

Mr. MYERS. The features of this bill were before the Committee on Patents of the last Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is debating the bill, and I make the point of order that it should go over under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman has begun to debate it; and therefore it goes over under the rule.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the bill be printed. The motion was agreed to.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill to regulate the practice and define the powers of the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases arising under the Constitution and laws thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF LOYALISTS FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. STEVENS introduced a bill relative to damages done to loyal men, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS subsequently moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred.

The motion to reconsider was entered on the Journal.

JURISDICTION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. SPALDING. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report for the consideration and action of the House the bill amendatory of the Judiciary act of the United States, and limiting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases involving the constitutionality of acts of Congress, &c., introduced into the last Congress by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, a member of the committee, and not passed for want of time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say for the information of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] that I have introduced this morning the same bill to which the resolution refers; and hence the adoption of the resolution is unnecessary.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I withdraw the resolution.

FURNISHING EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. SPALDING. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That a joint committee, to consist of two members of the Senate and three members of the House, be appointed to examine the accounts for repairs and furnishing the Executive Mansion, as provided for in the act making appropriations for deficiencies, &c., approved March 2, 1867.

Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that the appointment of this committee is rendered necessary in consequence of a proviso attached to the deficiency appropriation bill declaring that no further payment shall be made on any accounts for repairs and furnishing of the Executive Mansion until such accounts shall have been submitted to a joint committee of Congress, and approved by such committee. In order to carry out the appropriation which has been made, it is necessary, I understand, that we shall have a committee of the kind contemplated in this resolution. There are claimants—men who have rendered services and furnished materials—who cannot get their pay until the accounts have been approved by such a committee.

The SPEAKER. As this joint committee is required by a provision of law contained in the deficiency bill, the Chair would have appointed the members on the part of the House but for the fact that the law did not specify how many should compose the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. If no select committee be raised, will it not be in order to refer this matter to a joint standing committee whose appointment is already authorized by the action of the two Houses?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] can move to amend the resolution unless his colleague [Mr. SPALDING] demands the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the previous question will not be seconded, and that this matter will be referred to a joint standing committee.

Mr. SPALDING. I have examined the matter and have found that there is no joint standing committee to which the subject can be appropriately referred.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 41, noes 30; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. SPALDING and Mr. SCHENCK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. SCHENCK introduced a bill to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it were in order, I would state that this bill is word for word and letter for letter the same as that passed by the House on the 15th of February last; but that statement, not being in order, I will simply demand the previous question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer an amendment to accompany the reference of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, as the Chair understands, does not desire the reference of the bill. He wishes it passed now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that. I hope it will be done.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask whether this is the same bill which was passed by the House at its last session?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is word for word the same.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time, it was read at length.

The first section provides that instead of any grant of land or other bounty there shall be allowed and paid to each and every soldier, sailor, and marine, who faithfully served as such in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps of the United States, (including those recognized by Congress in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for completing the defenses of Washington, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1862, and including those borne on the rolls as "slaves,") and who has been, or may hereafter be, honorably discharged from such service, the sum of eight and one third dollars per month, or at the rate of $100 per year, as hereinafter provided, for all the time during which such soldier, sailor, or marine actually so served, between the 12th day of April, 1861, and the 19th day of April, 1865. And in the case of any such soldier, sailor, or marine, discharged from the service on account of wounds received in battle, or while engaged in the line of his duty, this allowance of bounty is to be computed and paid up to the end of the term of service for which his enlistment was made. And in case of the death of any such soldier, sailor, or marine, while in the service, or in case of his death after the discharge and before the end of his term of enlistment, if discharged on account of his being wounded, as provided, the allowance and payment is to be made to his widow if she has not been remarried, or if there be no widow then to the minor child or children of the deceased who may be under sixteen years of age.

The second section proposes to enact that in computing and ascertaining the bounty to be paid to any soldier, sailor, or marine, or his proper representative, under the provisions of this act, there shall be deducted therefrom any and all bounties already paid, or payable under existing laws by the United States, or by any State, county, city, town, or other municipal organization, or by any voluntary association, so that in no case shall the aggregate amount of bounty allowed and paid from all sources exceed eight and one third dollars for each month of actual faithful service, or at the rate of $100 per year. And in the case of any sailor or marine to whom prize money has been paid, or is payable, the amount of such prize money is also to be deducted, and only such amount of bounty paid as shall, together with such prize money and any other bounty paid or payable by the United States, or by any State, county, city, town, or other municipal organization, or by any voluntary association, amount in the aggregate to the sum allowed by this act.

The third section provides that no bounty under the provisions of this act shall be paid to or on account of any soldier, sailor, or marine who served as a substitute in either the Army or Navy, or who was a captured prisoner of war at the time of his enlistment, nor to any one who was discharged on his own application or request prior to the 19th day of April, 1865, unless such discharge was obtained with a view to reenlistment, or to accept promotion in the military or naval service of the United States, or to be transferred from one branch of the military service to another, and such person did actually so reenlist or accept promotion, or was so transferred. And no bounty is to be paid to any soldier, sailor, or marine discharged on the application or at the request of parents, guardians, or other persons, or on the ground of minority.

By the fourth section it is provided that every petition or application for bounty made under the provisions of this act shall disclose and state specifically, under oath, and under the pains and penalties of perjury, what amount of bounty, either from the United States or from any other source, and what amount of prize money, if any, has been paid or is payable to the soldier, sailor, or marine, by whom or by whose representatives the claim is made.

The fifth section provides that whenever application shall be made by any claimant, through any attorney or agent, the post office address of the claimant shall be furnished, giving the name of the county and State in which it is situated, and the amount of commission or fee which the attorney or agent is to receive for his service in the settlement of the claim, which charges in no case are to exceed the sum of five dollars; and every such application is to be accompanied by the written affidavit of the attorney or agent that he has not charged, nor agreed for, and will not accept more than such sum of five dollars for his services in the case. The Paymaster General, or proper accounting officer of the Treasury, upon ascertaining the amount due, is to cause to be transmitted to such claimant the full amount, deducting the fee to be paid to the attorney or agent, which fee shall be paid to said attorney or agent in person, or transmitted to such address as the attorney may direct.

The sixth section provides that any attorney or agent who shall receive from any claimant a sum greater than five dollars for the prosecution of any claim under the provisions of this act, upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine not to exceed the sum of $1,000, or imprisonment for a term not less than one year, or both, as the court or jury may adjudge, and shall be forever thereafter excluded from prosecuting claims of any nature whatever against the Government of the United States.

It is provided in the seventh section that in case the payments shall be made in the form of a check, order, or draft upon any paymaster, national bank, or Government depository in or near the district wherein the claimant may reside, it shall be necessary for the claimant to establish, by the affidavits of two credible witnesses, that he is the identical person named therein; but in no case are such checks, orders, or drafts to be made negotiable until after such identification.

The eighth section provides that it shall not be lawful for any soldier, sailor, or marine to transfer, assign, barter, or sell his discharge, final statement, descriptive list, or other papers, for the purpose of transferring, assigning, bartering, or selling any interest in any bounty under the provisions of this act; and all such transfers, assignments, barters, or sales heretofore made are hereby declared null and void as to any rights intended so to be conveyed by any such soldier, sailor, or marine.

The ninth section proposes to enact that in any case where a person entitled to receive payment of bounty under the provisions of this bill shall make application therefor, or where such application shall be made by the proper representatives of such person, being deceased, and the discharge of such person has been lost, it shall be competent for the accounting officers to receive, in lieu of the actual production of such discharge, proof of the actual loss of the same, and secondary proof of its issue and contents, together with proof of the identity of the claimant or person deceased, under such rules defining the character and form of the evidence as the Paymaster General shall prescribe.

By the tenth section it is provided that no adjustment or payment of any claim of any soldier, sailor, or marine, or of his proper representatives, under the provisions of this act, shall be made, unless the application be filed within two years from the passage of the act; and the settlement of accounts of deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines is to be made in the same manner as now provided by law.

The eleventh section provides for the repeal of sections twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen of an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, approved July 28, 1866. But if any money shall have been paid to any person under the provisions of those sections, the amount thereof is to be deducted in each case by the proper accounting officer from any sum to be allowed under this act. And any application made for allowance of bounty under the said act of July 28, 1866, with all the evidence and papers submitted therewith, is to be taken and considered as filed under the requirements of this act, and is to be used hereunder for the benefit of the applicant, as far as the same may be applicable. And all applications which have been made for bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, by persons who are entitled to bounty under this act, are to be acted on and payments made thereon as if this act had not been passed. But no person is to be paid a greater amount than he is entitled to under this act.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 51, noes 48.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 76, not voting 28; as follows:

Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Windom—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Brooks, Broomall, Cake, Covode, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Fox, Kitchen, Lynch, Mercur, Myers, O'Neill, Pike, Sitgreaves, Stone, and Thomas—18.

So the vote by which the main question was ordered was reconsidered.

During the vote, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, stated that his colleague, Mr. ALLISON, was called from the city by important business, but that if present he would vote against the reconsideration.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SCHENCK withdrew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BOUTWELL rose to debate the subject, and it went over under the rules.

The SPEAKER then stated the morning hour had expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. MUNGEN.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a concurrent resolution providing that a joint committee be appointed consisting of one on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House, to examine, allow, and approve claims and accounts for repairs, &c., of the Executive Mansion, and had appointed Mr. HARLAN as member of said committee on their part.

ELECTION CONTEST—DELANO VS. MORGAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Columbus Delano vs. George W. Morgan, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PERHAM asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. LYNCH, for two weeks.

SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I ask to be excused from service on the joint Committee on Retrenchment. They are expected to sit during the recess, and my business is such as to render it utterly impossible for me to serve during the recess.

No objection being made, Mr. WASHBURN was excused from service.

FENIAN MEETING.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter, which was laid on the table:

HEADQUARTERS FENIAN BROTHERHOOD,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1867.

Honorable the Speaker and members of the Fortieth Congress:

GENTLEMEN: I am directed by the committee of arrangements to respectfully invite the Representatives of the people of the United States to be present this evening at the mass meeting to be held at the Assembly Rooms, Louisiana avenue, to offer sympathy and support to the Irish republican cause.

The "boys in the field" are fighting for freedom, land, and life, and they look to America as their natural friend and ally.

The Irish-American race is counted by millions, and ingratitude is not among their national characteristics.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

RICHARD OULAHAN,
Chairman Committee of Arrangements.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the appointment of the following committees. He will state in this connection that he has been compelled to appoint a Committee on Enrolled Bills, as there are bills which have passed both Houses. He is also compelled to appoint a select Committee on the Library, inasmuch as on looking at the laws of the last session he finds that there are three contracts by law authorized to be made with that committee:

Committee on Foreign Affairs—Nathaniel P. Banks of Massachusetts, Godlove S. Orth of Indiana, Shelby M. Cullom of Illinois, Henry D. Washburn of Indiana, Dennis McCarthy of New York, Austin Blair of Michigan, Leonard Myers of Pennsylvania, William E. Robinson of New York, and George W. Morgan of Ohio.

Joint Committee on the Library—Rutherford B. Hayes of Ohio, John D. Baldwin of Massachusetts, and John V. L. Pruyn of New York.

Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills—Stephen F. Wilson of Pennsylvania, Benjamin F. Hopkins of Wisconsin, and William S. Holman of Indiana.

To fill vacancy on Joint Committee on Retrenchment—Martin Welker of Ohio, and George A. Halsey of New Jersey.

Special Committee on Niagara Ship-Canal—Burt Van Horn of New York, Burton C. Cook of Illinois, Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania, William B. Washburn of Massachusetts, and William Mungen of Ohio.

Select Committee on Clothing Destitute Soldiers—Norman B. Judd of Illinois, William A. Pile of Missouri, and Amasa Cobb of Wisconsin.

PRINTING PAPER.

Mr. LAFLIN, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House: 1. What amount of unused printing paper of class one and two was on hand at the Government Printing Office on the 1st of November last. 2. What amount of paper of the above classes was used at said office during the month of November, December, and January, respectively. 3. What amount of either of the above classes of paper, if any, was ordered subsequent to the date first named, to wit: November 1, up to the meeting of Congress in December last. 4. And if any such orders were given, the difference in cost to the Government between the weight thus furnished and the prices then paid, and those in force under the last contracts for paper.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making appropriations for the Department of Education; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It directs the appropriation of $9,400 for salaries of the Commissioner of Education and his clerks, and $6,000 for furnishing the offices and for stationery.

Mr. RANDALL. As this is an appropriation bill, I think it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules, so that the bill may be considered at this time. We passed at the last session a law establishing the Department of Education; and I understand that this morning the name of the Commissioner has been sent to the Senate. It will be necessary to make this appropriation in order to furnish the offices in the Department.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the motion to suspend the rules debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not if objection is made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to debate.

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 51, noes 35.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. GARFIELD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 62, noes 38.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the bill be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that an appropriate committee to examine and consider this bill?

The SPEAKER. The committee can take cognizance of any matter referred to them by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Can the Judiciary Committee report an appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. Any committee can report an appropriation bill if so directed to do by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it better be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, when appointed.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, when appointed, and to be printed.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires at this time to submit a question to the House. By the law to be found on page 122 of the Digest it is provided that mileage shall be paid to members of Congress for only two sessions of any one Congress, and that it shall be paid at the commencement of each regular session. This is the first regular session of the Fortieth Congress. The law declares that the money for mileage shall be paid at the commencement of each regular session. By the law of the last session, providing for the assembling of the Fortieth Congress, immediately after the expiration of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, it is declared that no person who was a member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session of Congress provided for by that law. Now, members of this Congress who were members of the last Congress cannot be entitled to receive additional mileage for this additional session. But the previous and unrepealed law seems to declare that one of the two mileages for the term shall be paid at the commencement of each regular session. And as the law requires the Speaker to certify to the accounts for mileage after they shall have been audited and passed upon by the Committee on Mileage, the Chair would ask that the question in regard to mileage be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for examination and report.

No objection was made.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Speaker be instructed to appoint such of the standing committees as have not yet been named, and that in appointing the said committees he is authorized, at his discretion, to constitute any of them by omitting for the present not exceeding two members from either of them, including, in such omission if he thinks proper, the name to stand first on the list; the vacancies to be filled by appointment from among members who may hereafter take their seats from States entitled to representation which have not yet held their elections.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the Chair will state that the appointment of committees, as is known to all members, is the most delicate, perplexing, and irresponsible of all the duties imposed upon the occupant of this chair. When the appointments are completed the Chair is painfully conscious of the fact that he has not satisfied every member of the House, and he finds it difficult, in the geographical and political cast which must be given to the committees, to even satisfy himself entirely.

But the Chair entertains the belief that if a resolution of the character proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] should be adopted, his perplexities would be increased tenfold. If, in the appointment of the committees, he should leave vacant the place of chairman of any committee, it would be a notice to the House that he expected certain persons to be elected from the States not now represented in this House, from whom he might select such chairman. In that expectation of course the Chair might be disappointed, and his embarrassments would be thereby increased.

The Chair on a former occasion stated his indisposition to appoint any committees except such as are absolutely necessary to carry on such business as will come up during the brief period this session of Congress may be expected to last, knowing the embarrassment that would result through the entire Congress if the committees were all to be appointed, with six or seven of the States, not yet having elected their Representatives to this House. The Chair is bound, of course, as the servant of the House to obey the orders of the House; but the Chair has already stated, privately, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that in his opinion it would increase his difficulties greatly if he should be required to appoint all the committees at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK. My object is not to embarrass the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands the gentleman. There are embarrassments either way, as the Chair understands.

Mr. SCHENCK. It seems to me to be very difficult to get along with our business without any committees. We are referring business continually to committees, when appointed. We have no standing committees now, with certain exceptions. I suppose the Clerk did not read my resolution so that the House could understand it clearly. The object of the resolution is to enable the Speaker to appoint the standing committees, leaving it to his discretion to omit one or two members from any committee, either at the head or the tail or in the middle, so that hereafter, when members shall have been elected from States which have not yet held their elections, vacancies may be filled. Let me say that one trouble which now embarrasses us is, that while business is accumulating upon the committees when appointed, we have gentlemen here fully competent for their places as clerks of those committees, and we do not know whether to tell them to go home or to stay here. All the other employés about the House are in the receipt of compensation; but those members who expect to be on committees are unable to tell these men what they shall do under these circumstances. I confess that I do not see the embarrassment of which the Chair speaks, although of course he is the best judge of that. I think he might, at his discretion, leave off one or two members of committees to be appointed hereafter.

If the resolution is objected to by any member, I shall not move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. STEVENS. I am not sure whether the Committee on Enrolled Bills has yet been appointed.

The SPEAKER. That committee was appointed this morning.

Mr. BLAINE. I object to the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I will not press it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he knows there are embarrassments each way; but he has thought, on consideration, that it would be the least embarrassment for us to go on in the way we are now doing.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would inquire whether an arrangement might not be made by which the committees should be appointed temporarily, to expire with the present session of Congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that if he were appointed temporarily on a committee, he would expect to be appointed permanently on the same committee.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. KERR. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and before it is read I wish to say that if the House concludes to raise such a committee, I do not desire to be appointed chairman of it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed by the Chair, whose duty it shall be to consider and revise all the resolutions and laws affecting the expenditure of the contingent and other funds of this House, and to report by bill a substitute for all of them which shall better guard the interests of this House and country in such matters, unless, after investigation said committee shall think the existing laws and resolutions sufficient. And the better to enable said committee to perform their duty in the premises they shall have power to send for and examine persons and papers.

Mr. CULLOM. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ECKLEY asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all books and public documents of which extra copies have been ordered to be printed for distribution, and which have not been delivered to the persons entitled thereto under the resolution of the last House of Representatives, shall now be delivered by the officer having possession of the same, to the Representatives in this House of those districts whose former Representatives have not drawn the documents to which such districts were respectively entitled, according to the rate of distribution established.

Mr. PAINE. I object.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer a joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of the law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny.

The joint resolution was read for information.

Whereas during the last hours of the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress an act was passed without discussion for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny, granting to said heirs land warrants for seventy-five thousand eight hundred and forty acres of land; and whereas by the solemn decision and judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States after full hearing it was in the year 1853 adjudged that the private land claim on which said act is based was invalid, null, and void; and whereas Mr. Justice Nelson, who delivered the opinion of the court, declared that there was no record evidence of any such land grant as was set up, "that none had been produced, though a thorough examination of the archives of that date, both at New Orleans and Paris had been made, and no records could be found;" and whereas it was also declared by said Judge Nelson, "that there was not the slightest ground for the claim set up" to a tract of land running back from the Mississippi river to the Atchafalaya; and that at the most the petitioners could not claim, under any grant or survey, over two thousand five hundred or three thousand acres, instead of about half a million—the report of which decision is found in 15 Howard's Reports, page 14; and whereas said private land claim, after full review by Hon. M. Burchard, solicitor of the General Land Office in 1838, declared that the same was invalid and void; and whereas said pretended private land claim had its origin in 1717, and was a part of the celebrated Mississippi scheme with which John Law, known for his connection with the South Sea bubble, was a party; and whereas the legalizing of this claim will revive and legalize claims to the amount of many million acres; and whereas there is grave reason for believing that said act was passed under a misapprehension of the facts: Therefore,

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to suspend the execution of said law until the further order of Congress.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I object. The facts stated in the resolution are not true.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I am perfectly familiar with this case, and I am certain that the facts stated are true.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I was a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims which reported this case to the last Congress, and I state that the facts set forth in the preamble to this joint resolution are not true.

REORGANIZATION OF REBEL STATES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, on the 7th instant the House adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed, be instructed to report a bill declaring who shall call conventions for the reorganization of the rebel States, and providing for the registration of voters within said rebel States; and all elections for members of said conventions, or for the adoption or rejection of constitutions formed by said conventions, or for the choice of public officers, State and municipal, until the constitutions of said States shall have been approved by Congress, shall be by ballot.

In accordance with the directions of the House contained in this resolution, the Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to report a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, I ask leave to report the bill now.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section that the commanding general in each district defined by the act of March 2,

1867, to which the bill is supplementary, shall cause a registration to be made before the 1st day of September, 1867, in each county or parish in the several States included in his district, of the male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish, which registration is to include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act to which this is supplementary, and who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation:

I, ———, of ———, in the county or parish of ———, in the State of ———, do hereby solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am sincerely and earnestly attached to the Union and Government of the United States; that I will steadfastly support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and that I will to the best of my ability engage all others to such support and obedience. So help me God.

The second section proposes to enact that whenever the registration provided for shall be completed and copies thereof returned to the commanding general, he shall cause to be held in each State of his district, on a day not less than thirty days from the date of his proclamation thereof, an election of delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution for the State and of firmly reestablishing a civil government loyal to the Union therein, and of passing all needful ordinances for putting such constitution and government into operation.

The third section provides that the convention in each State shall consist of the number of members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State under the constitution thereof existing January 1, 1860; and the election districts as existing on that day are to be observed in the election and the assignment of delegates. The commanding general of each military district is to assign as nearly as may be to the several election districts in each State within his jurisdiction the number of delegates to which it may be entitled according to the number of registered voters within its limits; but each district is to be entitled to at least one delegate.

In the fourth section it is provided that the commanding general of each district shall appoint such loyal officers or persons as may be necessary, not exceeding three in each election district, to make and complete a registration, to preside at the election, to receive, sort, and count the votes, and to make return to him of the votes, lists of voters, and of the persons elected as delegates by a plurality of the votes cast at such election; and upon receiving such returns he is to open the same, ascertain the persons elected as delegates, according to the returns of the officers who conducted the election, and make proclamation thereof; and within sixty days from the date of the election he is to notify the delegates to assemble at a time and place to be mentioned in the notification, to proceed to the organization of a convention. When the convention shall have framed a constitution in accordance with the act of March 2, 1867, the constitution is to be submitted by the convention to the persons registered under the provisions of this act at an election to be conducted by the officers or persons appointed by the commanding general as already provided, and to be held after the expiration of thirty days from the date of notice thereof to be given by the convention; and the returns thereof are to be made to the commanding general of the district.

The fifth section provides that, if according to such return the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as already specified, the president of the convention is to transmit a copy of the same duly certified to the President of the United States, who is forthwith to transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if such constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the fifth section of the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and if the other provisions of that act shall have been complied with, the State is to be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives are to be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

In section six it is provided that all elections in the States mentioned in the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States shall, during the operation of said act, be by ballot; and all officers making the said registration of voters and conducting said elections are, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, to take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office."

The seventh section provides that all expenses incurred by the several commanding generals, or by virtue of any orders issued or appointments made by them, under or by virtue of this act, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The eighth section proposes to enact that the convention for each State shall prescribe the fees, salary, and compensation to be paid to all delegates and other officers and agents herein authorized and necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act not herein otherwise provided for, and shall provide for the levy and collection of such taxes on the property in such States as may be necessary to pay the same.

Mr. WOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to object?

Mr. WOOD. I rise to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. Then there is no objection; and the bill is introduced.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to offer an amendment to the first section. I have consulted with the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary relative to this amendment, and they agree in the propriety of making it, but I do not feel authorized, inasmuch as there was no session of the committee, to offer it as coming from them. I offer it, however, with the indorsement of a majority of the committee. It is as follows:

Page 2, third line of the oath after the word "am" insert "not excluded from the right to vote by the provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act passed March 2, 1867, entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' that I am."

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he designs to take a vote on this today?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is my design to ask the House to come to a vote on it within an hour.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take occasion to say that this bill contains principles which, in my judgment, no true republican can assent to. The existing law gives to the people of the provisional governments recognized in the southern States the power to initiate the preparatory proceedings in the conventions which are to frame constitutions of State government; and as I understand the effect of this bill, it is to give that power entirely into the hands of the military commanders, to establish governments for these States as Louis Napoleon established an empire for France, as Maximilian proposed to establish an empire in Mexico. It is an effort to take away all the existing civil power in those States, all the civil power existing in the people of those States, recognized by the bill of the last session of Congress, and to give it entirely into the hands of the military governors proposed to be established over that people. Therefore I for one can never consent that any military power shall supervise, direct, control, or influence the establishment of civil government in any State or Territory in this land.

I am not prepared to discuss it at length at this time, certainly not in the time allotted for the discussion of a question of such vast magnitude. I only rise to say it is anti-republican and contrary to the genius of the institutions of this country. It is the operation of a principle which may be carried into the North, East, and West, as well as the South. It is setting up military authority over and above all existing constitutional executive, legislative, and judicial powers of the Government. It is against the recognition of that principle I object and protest.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This bill does not conflict in the least with that passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States. If the gentleman from New York will refer to the sixth section of that act he will find it provides—

"That until the people of said rebel States shall be by law admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, any civil government which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same."

Now, sir, so far as this bill may interfere with the exercise of power by the provisional governments now existing in those States, it is following precisely the purpose of Congress when it incorporated in the sixth section the language which I have read. Instead of this being a bill to fix upon the people of the rebel States a military government, or to establish a military despotism, it provides the machinery whereby those people may get from under the military governments which have already been established in those States by the act of the last Congress.

Mr. WOOD. May I ask the gentleman whether it does not in terms direct that this registry shall be made under the direction of the military commander?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, certainly it does. There is no provision at all in the act of March 2 for the registration of voters, but there are provisions in that act determining who may vote within those States. Now, sir, it is for the purpose of enabling the persons authorized to exercise the franchise in those States to act that this bill provides for a registration under the supervision of the military commander.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to ask the gentleman a single question. I wish to understand if this bill is not designed expressly and unqualifiedly to give to everybody an even start in the election?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That certainly is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. So that no one in possession or out of possession is to be prejudiced by any action of ours, but we intend to secure to everybody entitled to vote at all an even start in the race.

Mr. WOOD. That depends entirely upon the authority and the will of the military commander there. He has all authority in making up the registry lists according to which the people are to vote. His power over the people is greater in making up that list than in the mere mechanical process of voting.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The military commander will be controlled by the provisions of this bill, and it provides—

"That the commanding general in each district defined by the act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, shall cause a registry to be made before the 1st day of September, 1867, in each county or parish in the several States included in his district, of all the male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish, which registration shall include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the said act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and who shall have taken or subscribed the following oath."

The military commander of the district will be bound to follow the provisions of this bill. He cannot extend the time for the completion of the registry beyond the 1st day of September. We limit him to that time in order that the people in those States entitled to the exercise of the elective franchise may have an opportunity of moving under the legislation of Congress toward the organization of civil governments within those States.

This bill is intended to come in aid of the legislation of the last Congress. Every person who has read the act of March 2 knows that it is imperfect in its provisions. While it declares that certain persons shall be entitled to exercise the elective franchise and certain others shall not be so entitled, it provides no machinery whatever for carrying into effect those provisions. This bill supplies that defect.

Mr. WOOD. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD. I ask whether this bill does not attempt to supply another defect in the existing law by giving to the military commander power to compel an organization under that bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It does compel the military commander to proceed with the registration; it compels him to order an election of delegates; it compels him to provide for the holding of a constitutional convention; but after that is done, the results of the labors of that convention are to be submitted to the people to be passed upon by them, and if a majority of the people vote against the constitution which is thus submitted to them, there will then be no organized civil government under the action of that convention. So the whole thing is left in the hands of the people after all.

Mr. WOOD. Under military direction.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Under military direction as to when they will hold this convention, as to who shall go upon the registration, that is, with the limitation prescribed in the law, and that only. Those entitled to vote under the provisions of the act of March 2 must be placed on the registry. It is simply providing for the organization of civil government through the military arm of the Government of the United States, but leaving the acceptance or rejection of the work of the convention exclusively in the hands of the several States.

Now, unless some gentleman desires further explanation of this bill, I will ask the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the propriety of correcting one line of the fifth section of the bill. By reference to the bill, as reported, the gentleman will see that by the bill as it now stands it is expressly provided that it shall require a majority of the electors "as herein provided" to ratify the constitution. I ask the gentleman to consider the propriety of inserting the words "votes given at said election by" before the words "electors as herein provided."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to the gentleman offering that amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I offer that amendment, because it is perfectly apparent that as the bill now stands if at the election three fourths of all the qualified electors in the State should vote, and two to one should vote in favor of the constitution, yet if the vote should fall short only twenty votes of a majority of the qualified electors registered the constitution would be defeated.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am not objecting to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask then that the words I have indicated be inserted before the words "qualified electors."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not wish to be misunderstood in regard to this amendment. I yield in order that the gentleman from Ohio may have a vote upon it. I do not accept it, because the question was considered in the Committee on the Judiciary and the judgment of the committee was against it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could not accept it, the bill being a report from a committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The judgment of the committee was against it upon this ground: that in the rebel States the whites being in the possession of political power might by threats and intimidation prevent the colored citizens from voting, keep them away from the polls, and adopt a constitution which would not be free and equal in its operation, and therefore they rejected that amendment when it was proposed in the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to remind the House that the Congress is to be the judge whether the constitution so ratified by a majority of the electors is a constitution, not only in conformity of the law to which this is supplementary, but with the Constitution of the United States and also with the pending amendment to the Constitution of the United States; so that the Congress of the United States will themselves have the power to protect these people if it shall turn out that any such imposition is practiced upon them.

Now, I beg leave to remind the House again that unless this amendment be made, that although the constitution of one of these States may be in all respects what we would desire to have it, yet if perchance it should turn out that the vote given for the ratification of the constitution, so just and fair and wise that every honest man in America would favor it, it should fall short twenty votes of receiving a majority of the registered votes, it could not go into effect at all. It is for that reason that I ask for the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, the objection, in my mind, to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is deeper than has yet been suggested. It is this: that we must assume, in regard to the people of these ten States, that thus far the controlling political forces are disloyal to the Government. What we ask in reconstructing these States is to secure a loyal majority.

Now, then, under the amendment proposed by my friend from Ohio this might happen: if one hundred thousand persons be registered as voters in North Carolina, for example, and fifty thousand of them go to the polls, and twenty-six thousand of them vote for the constitution which has been prepared by the convention, you have then a constitution adopted and binding, if this amendment prevails, so far as any constitution can be binding; and yet pretty nearly three fourths of the people of the State have either absented themselves from the polls or have voted against the constitution, and we have no security that more than twenty-six thousand of the one hundred thousand voters of the State are in favor of the frame of government which has been set up.

Now, I say that the case is different in one of these States from what it would be in New York, for example, where the people are known to be loyal. If, as is proposed in that State, the constitution be revised or a new one be made, and the work of the revising convention be submitted to the people and only one half of the electors choose to attend the polls and pass judgment upon it, the presumption is that those who stay away assent to the work which has been done. But in the rebel States the presumption is that those who stay away are opposed to the work of the convention; and hence it may happen, if this amendment prevails, that you will have a frame of government set up which has the support of hardly one fourth of the people of the State. Now, the suggestion I make is, that we ought in the beginning to assert the doctrine that a majority of the people of these States shall assent to the work done by the conventions, and show that they are ready to sustain the framework of government thus set up in harmony with the Constitution of the United States.

And I submit that the power which Congress has to reject the work of any of these conventions is merely a negative power. I know very well that when any of the rebel States come here with the work of their conventions, and it conforms to the acts of Congress, even though but one third or one quarter of their people have assented to it, we shall be under an irresistible pressure to accept what they have done, and to admit their Representatives to seats upon this floor. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. [Mr. BINGHAM.]

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 31) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States,'" approved March 21, 1866;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) supplementary to other joint resolutions, to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) extending the time for the completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

REORGANIZATION OF REBEL STATES—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state that the provision of this bill follows precisely the provision of the reconstruction bill which was passed by the Thirty-Eighth Congress; which bill was prepared by the late Henry Winter Davis. That bill required the assent of a majority of all the voters of the State to the adoption of the constitution and the establishment of a State government.

Mr. BINGHAM. This bill puts it into the power of a small minority of the voters of a State to defeat the will of a large majority as long as a hundred men perhaps refuse stubbornly to cast their votes.

I will make one further remark in this connection, and then leave the matter to the House. To my mind nothing is clearer than that the organized represented States of this Union are the Union; and twenty of those States, being three fourths of the whole number represented, having ratified the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, that amendment has now become part of the fundamental law. That being done, when you have passed this bill, amended as I have proposed, I undertake to say that with the express grant of powers put for the first time into the Constitution of your country it is utterly impossible, so long as the Representatives of the people are true to the trust committed to them, that any advantages shall be taken in all the years to come of these men called freedmen, and who in these southern States approximate in number to the white population, and in some of the States, as in the State of South Carolina, an overwhelming majority of all the population.

Having said this much, all I ask is that I may have a vote upon my amendment by yeas and nays; and then I will be content with the result of the vote so taken.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. An additional objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is, that he proposes to bring into Congress for determination the question whether a majority of the people have adopted the constitution of State government. This bill proposes to leave that question to the ballot-box in each State by providing that before a constitution shall go into effect the result of the vote shall show that a majority of the persons whose names are on the register have voted in favor of that constitution.

Mr. BINGHAM. My amendment does not propose to change the bill in that respect at all. If my amendment presents this question to Congress for determination so the bill itself does.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is a very easy matter to determine, when the result of an election has been sent to Congress, whether a majority of the whole number upon the register have voted in favor of the ratification of a constitution. But according to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] we must organize an investigating committee to determine how many persons in these States have voted, how many have not, and the reasons why. I wish to avoid that, and let it be determined by the registry itself.

Mr. BINGHAM. If my amendment be adopted, that matter will rest upon the certificate of the commanding officer; and if my amendment is rejected, it will in like manner rest upon his certificate; so that the adoption of my amendment would raise no new question at all in that respect.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to call the attention of members of this House to what is taking place here to-day, in connection with what occurred at the last session of the last Congress upon this question of reconstruction. When the bill to which I understand this to be supplementary came back to the House after it had been acted upon by the Senate, containing an amendment by the Senate similar to a proposition originally offered here by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE], a strong pressure was brought to bear upon members on this side of the House to induce us to vote in such a way as to cut off any further amendment by the House and bring the House to a vote on the amendments of the Senate. It was claimed that by that means we would be enabled to defeat measures which would be likely to follow the rejection of the amendments of the Senate, measures which would be far more obnoxious to the conservative members of the House. And when we upon this side of the House failed to vote for a second of the demand for the previous question, so as to cut off amendments in the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] and others who acted with him complained of us, and said that if we had stood by the more conservative portion of the Republican party we would have kept out these obnoxious provisions of the House and have secured the amendments of the Senate as a finality upon this question of reconstruction.

My object in seeking the floor was simply to call attention to the fact that nothing which we on this side of the House can do in conjunction with anybody on the other side can in the least degree arrest the legislation which is being inflicted upon the country in connection with this matter of reconstruction. The whole question is in the control of a majority of the House; and whenever on any occasion we may succeed temporarily in checking the tide of radical legislation, the earliest opportunity is embraced by some gentleman on that side to introduce something still more radical. We have not to-day, and have not had on any previous occasion, any power over this matter. We are obliged to sit by and see done that against which we can only enter our protest, without the slightest power to influence action upon the question one way or another.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt that the position which gentlemen on the other side of the House who were members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress occupy in relation to the act of the 2d of March last is an uncomfortable one; and I do not wonder that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] seeks to explain away its embarrassing points.

For one I voted to concur with the Senate amendment, because I believed it was the best thing we could do during that session. Having been defeated on that vote, I here to-day tender my thanks to gentlemen on the other side of the House for having assisted in defeating that amendment. I was in favor of taking that which seemed to me the best thing we could get; but the gentlemen on the other side, acting probably under a fit of radicalism, would not let the conservative gentlemen on this side of the House have their own way in that matter. The result was that when the bill came back from the Senate, I retraced my steps so far as I could, the door having been opened by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, and offered an amendment which appeared in the act of the 2d of March as the proviso to the fifth section. I am furthermore glad that the opposition on that side of the House succeeded in enabling my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to get his amendment attached to the bill, which is found in the act of the 2d of March as the sixth or last section.

Hence, gentlemen on that side of the House may thank themselves—their friends in the South may thank them also—for those features of the reconstruction act of the 2d of March; and they may also thank themselves for this bill which I have reported to-day, because the amendment which was put on that bill after it came back from the Senate rendered this bill necessary. It is absolutely necessary that we shall have the machinery provided for in this bill to carry out the provisions which the gentlemen on that side of the House induced this House to put in the act of the 2d of March.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman will permit me to say that we on this side of the House are willing to join him to-day in repealing that obnoxious section.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have been returning my thanks to the gentlemen for what they have accomplished. I like the act in its present form much better than I did in the form in which it came back from the Senate, with the "Sherman amendment," as it was called. I have been returning, and I again return, to the gentleman from Indiana, and those who acted with him, my thanks and the thanks of my political associates for their action on that occasion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I wish right here to decline the compliment which the gentleman from Iowa has seen fit to pay to this side of the House. I, for one, do not desire it. On the occasion to which the gentleman refers I voted to sustain the previous question—almost the only occasion on which during the Thirty-Ninth Congress I did so vote.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I do not extend my thanks to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I decline the honor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of participating in this side-bar discussion upon the question on whom the responsibility for the legislation of the last Congress rests. As we on this side constituted a minority of barely one fifth of the House, I imagine it will be very difficult to convince the country that the responsibility for the unconstitutional, and as I deem it (with all proper respect for the majority here) iniquitous legislation of the last Congress, rests upon us on this side. Both of the propositions referred to were objectionable, and equally objectionable to the minority, because, according to our understanding of the Constitution, it was not competent for Congress to pass the one or the other, and we could not, on the responsibility of our oaths, give our sanction to either. And it does not, therefore, become gentlemen calling themselves conservative Republicans to attempt to throw the odium of any portion of this legislation on the Democratic minority, who could not, without violation of their oaths, give their sanction to either one of the propositions. But I did not rise for the purpose of entering into any discussion of this question, and it is only because my attention was called to it by the remarks just made that I have alluded to it at all.

Mr. Speaker, I did rise for the purpose of inquiring whether the bill, as reported, provides that there must be a majority of the votes of the registered voters cast for the constitution at the election provided for, and failing in this that the whole proceeding shall fall to the ground and amount to nothing? If that be so I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact. I may possibly be mistaken, but it was certainly my understanding that the committee directed that the bill should in this respect conform to the bill to which this is amendatory, which requires only a majority of the votes cast at the election to give validity to the proposed constitution. This is in direct conflict with the act of March 2, and I wish to ask the chairman whether the committee did not direct that it should in this respect conform to the provisions of said act?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A motion was made to insert after the word "or" the word "all," which was adopted into the language of the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. This requires, then, a majority of the registered votes to be cast in favor of the adoption of the constitution?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is as I consider it.

Mr. MARSHALL. Is not that in conflict with the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why?

Mr. MARSHALL. Because that only requires a majority of the votes cast at the election to give vitality to the proposed constitution. Now, what is the object of this change? Why do gentlemen abandon their own legislation adopted only a few days ago?

Mr. BLAINE. Is not the gentleman from Illinois opposed to instituting a minority government in any of these States?

Mr. MARSHALL. I am.

Mr. BLAINE. Is not the provision, as it stands in the bill, the most certain mode to prevent a minority government?

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not see why. I should prefer very much myself that this bill had left it as provided in the act to which this is an amendment. If we must have these miserable mongrel governments fastened on the country, and can get the Union restored in no other way, the sooner we are rid of the business the better. The provision to which I am objecting can only tend to produce procrastination and delay in the settlement of these vexed questions, and seem to be introduced only to prevent restoration even on the plan indicated by Congress. It is but fair to suppose that the legislation of the last Congress on this subject was adopted after mature deliberation, the majority having been working on the subject for nearly two years; and it looks like trifling upon a very grave question, or the work of men who are stumbling in the dark, and know not what they really do want, to be changing ground every day upon a subject so vital to the interests of the whole country.

And now, sir, while I am up I wish to submit another remark or two. As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, if I remained silent it might be taken for granted that I gave my sanction to this legislation. I do not propose at this time to enter into a discussion of the great questions involved in this bill and the one to which it is an amendment. I do not think there is any warrant in the Constitution whatever for either of them. It seems to me almost impossible for any gentleman in this House to suppose for a moment that there is any authority whatever in the Constitution for this legislation. During the first six months of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress there were not probably ten men on this floor who assumed or pretended to think that Congress had any such power, and therefore it was that we saw during that session a perfect inundation of amendments to the Constitution. It was then openly or tacitly admitted that we had no shadow of power to interfere with the subject of suffrage in the States. The doctrine that the Union was virtually dissolved by the war, and the insurgent States reduced to a territorial condition, then had very few friends or supporters on any side of this Hall. Now we have legislation, however, which undertakes to do in these southern States what never heretofore has been attempted in any of the Territories.

Never before in the history of our Government I believe has Congress undertaken to dictate to the people of a Territory, by the intervention of a military commander or otherwise, the character of the constitution they should adopt, or to compel them to adopt any character of constitution. If in reference to territorial governments it has never been attempted to claim such powers for Congress, certainly they could not be claimed in reference to States. If Congress possesses these powers now, it had them when the Thirty-Ninth Congress first assembled. The Constitution has not been changed within that time. And if these extraordinary powers have existed, why have they not been exercised; and why has restoration been delayed until this time? Why did Congress go on blundering from month to month, from folly to folly, until the close of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, before passing any bill that looked to restoration?

It is undeniable that during all this time it was tacitly admitted on all sides, and in fact publicly declared, that Congress had no power to interfere with the question of suffrage in the States or to assume the powers that are attempted to be exercised in this bill. Over one hundred amendments to the Constitution were offered, and a great part of the first session of the last Congress was taken up in an attempt to amend the Constitution so that Congress should have some such power as is contemplated in this bill. Congress and the party that now dominates over this country have manifestly merely blundered on from one folly and crime to another until they have reached their present position. It was neither foreseen nor intended by them. Having placed themselves in opposition to the constitutional, reasonable, and patriotic policy of the President, they were utterly unable for more than a year to present any plan of their own looking toward restoration. Having placed themselves outside of the Constitution, they have floundered on from one folly to another until they have not only destroyed the Union, but are themselves, as a party, standing on the very brink of destruction. The clamors of the people for a restoration of their Government cannot be silenced. Involved in inextricable difficulties by their own madness and folly in opposing the direct mode of restoration indicated by the Constitution itself, forced by the clamors of the people to adopt some policy or to consent to being driven in disgrace from place and power, they have in their fright adopted these measures which it is impossible that their judgments can approve, and which they will not dare to defend by reference to any principles of the Constitution.

The majority have evidently closed their eyes and shut their ears to all constitutional arguments and considerations, abandoned all the discussions which they were so fond of indulging in a year ago, and determined to plunge blindly into the gulf before them; preferring that to a return to the constitutional principles from which they have departed, and reckless whether it shall or not bring to ruin and devastation the noblest fabric of Government ever devised by man.

In regard to this particular measure I have only this to say: that the bill of the last Congress having been adopted, and the majority who now have control of this Government absolutely having determined to force their scheme upon the country, I think it is but right and proper that they should indicate the mode by which the proposed governments are to be organized, otherwise, as it is left by the original bill, there is danger of a conflict among the people of the unrepresented States in attempting to organize under said act. Already in some of those States some of those wandering vagabonds calling themselves southern loyalists are stirring up the negro population to organize purely negro governments in defiance of the action of the existing State authorities, and this may lead to complications and difficulties of the gravest character. These agitators will doubtless combine with the negro element, and form and present constitutions adopted almost exclusively by the negro population, while the white men in those States will organize governments in which the white element will predominate. Now, sir, when that is done, it will not be difficult to guess which one of these governments will be recognized by this loyal Congress. I have no doubt that the majority here will prefer the negro's to the white man's government. But it will be impossible for me to give my vote for this or any kindred measure. I regard this whole legislation as clearly unconstitutional. We are establishing precedents which are dangerous to our institutions, and which must, if followed, lead to their entire subversion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As to the question of power discussed by my colleague on the committee, I shall accept the determination of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. All of these questions were determined by that Congress in the passage of the act of the 2d of March. As to the principles involved in that exercise of power, we have just heard the gentleman's indorsement of them. He refers to the "patriotic and reasonable policy" of the President. Now, sir, if it is patriotic and reasonable, and if the principles involved in that policy do not conflict with those established by Congress, we have the gentleman's indorsement of the very principles embraced in the act of March 2, and embodied in the bill before the House. The President, in his "patriotic and reasonable policy," undertook to go into the rebel States and determine who should and who should not vote. Now, it is the great source of complaint with the gentleman from Illinois that Congress by the act of March 2 undertook to regulate the elective franchise within the States; but while the complaint is still resting upon his lips he gives his hearty indorsement of the patriotic and reasonable policy of the President, whereby the Executive undertook to exercise the precise power that Congress exercised when it passed the act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, I do not understand that the President of the United States ever undertook to settle the question of suffrage in the States. But let me state what I intended in referring to the policy of the President. There are many things done by the present Executive which I do not indorse, including probably some things in regard to the southern States. But that portion of the policy of the President which I do indorse, and which I believe would have brought peace to the country and restoration of the Union, is simply this: that the southern States ought to have been recognized as States in the Union, never out of it; and when they sent loyal representatives to Congress, who, according to any rule prescribed by the Congress, were entitled to be admitted, who could honestly in good faith take the oath required of every member whether coming from the North or South, such members ought to have been admitted.

But others who could not take the oath, and who were not qualified according to the rules prescribed, would, in pursuance of that policy, have to go home and tell their constituents, "We were refused admission, not because our State was in any sense out of the Union, not because you are not entitled to representation in Congress, but because I am personally disqualified. When you elect men who are free from these personal disqualifications under the laws as they now exist, those men will be admitted. Until you do so your seats in Congress will remain vacant, to be occupied whenever you send representatives personally qualified to take them." The people would then have understood that they would have to return loyal men, the whole question of restoration would have been decided, and the Union restored long ago. That portion of the policy of the President I do indorse, and I think a departure from it has led the majority here into all the difficulties into and through which they have been blundering and stumbling over, under and in defiance of the Constitution of their country. This policy of the President and of Constitution-loving conservative masses of the country would have given us union, peace, fraternity, and prosperity, and have freed us forever from the dangerous complications and difficulties by which we are surrounded, and which threaten to engulf all we hold most dear on earth.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My colleague on the Judiciary Committee who has just taken his seat indorses that part of the President's policy which is no part of it. The President when he inaugurated his policy certainly did not believe that the rebel States were States in the Union; but he provided immediately for the calling of conventions in those States, and directed those conventions to frame such constitutions as he deemed proper and right. Why did he enter those States and declare by his proclamations that certain persons should be entitled to vote, and that certain other persons should not exercise the right of the elective franchise? The gentleman cannot escape by saying that he indorses that part of the President's policy only as recognized these as States. He must take the policy as it was inaugurated, for the purposes for which it was inaugurated under the surrounding circumstances. The President by his proclamations declared that by the rebellion these States had been deprived of all civil governments, and as the Chief Executive officer of the nation, he went in there to aid the people in the organization of governments just as we are doing now. We are seeking by this legislation merely to aid the people of these States in the organization of governments which shall secure the rights of all the citizens of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, it is well known to those who were members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress that, with the views I entertain, I can no more vote for this bill than I could have voted for the one which passed at the last Congress. I believe there is no warrant or authority in the Constitution for the passage of either. The provisions of both are in open and flagrant violation of that instrument, and a most wicked subversion of the liberties it was intended to secure.

But I object to this bill for another reason. I object to it because it is a declaration to the country, to the people of the southern States, that this Congress has even yet no definite or settled policy with reference to their restoration to the Union. It repudiates the idea that the bill which was passed over the veto of the President for reconstruction, as it was represented to the country, was the ultimatum of Congress as intended to be the plan for the final settlement of our unhappy difficulties with the people of those States. It is a virtual declaration by the majority of this House that it claims the power, and intends day by day, and day after day, to institute just such measures in regard to that people as its partisan purposes may suggest and require. That submission to your requirements is an invitation only for further demands and still greater impositions and exactions.

I object to this bill further, because it is another declaration that Congress, while condemning the presidential policy, has no policy of its own; no plan by which it is willing to abide; none by which restoration and reconciliation can be permitted to take place. The bill passed at the last session provided for placing those States under military governments, and allowed the military officers in command in their discretion to recognize and permit the State governments to continue as provisional governments, as they were called. By this bill these military officers are not permitted to allow these State governments to act, but the military must appoint registers to enroll the voters, fix the day for elections, and control all the proceedings by the bayonet.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] made an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] in which he seemed to think there was some force, as to whether we desire to have a minority of the people establish governments there. If we do not we must certainly be opposed to the provisions of this bill; for by its terms you deny to the majority of the people of these States the right to participate in the formation of their government. Both of these bills are intended to subject the majority of the people to the control of the minority. But neither the minority nor the majority are to be free to act; both and all are to be under the control of the military officer in command. Obedience to his command is to be enforced at the point of the bayonet. These measures are to be enforced upon the southern people for the purpose of building up a radical party there, a party that will support the measures and policy of this fanatical Congress. To this end and for this purpose you would subject the white people of those States to the control of their former black servants. These measures are intended to disfranchise the white man and enfranchise the black; to humble and bow down the white man, and place in power in his stead the feeble black man, whom you can control for your own party purposes.

If this bill does not accomplish this object, another session of Congress will be called for the purpose of adopting some measure that will have the effect.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As the hour to which I am entitled has nearly expired, I desire to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has only two minutes remaining.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to offer a motion to have this bill recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to strike out the provisions requiring that these military commanders shall do this thing at a given time, thus making an iron rule for all the States. Some States may be more ready than others, some in a better condition than others; and therefore I do not see why we should be in such haste to adopt an iron rule which would enable some States to come back before, in the judgment of the military commander, they are in a proper condition to come back. I therefore favor a recommitment of the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot yield for that purpose. This bill now gives the military commander until the 1st of September next. I now call the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

FURNISHING EXECUTIVE MANSION.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, one of its Clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the concurrent resolution of the House providing for the appointment of a joint committee to examine the accounts for repairs and furnishing of the Executive Mansion, and had appointed Mr. HARLAN and Mr. NORTON as the committee on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of the following named gentlemen as the committee on the part of the House, Mr. SPALDING, Mr. BEAMAN, and Mr. GLOSSBRENNER.

REORGANIZATION OF REBEL STATES—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the reorganization of the rebel States.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table; and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 115, not voting 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Burr, Chandler, Denison, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Kerr, Marshall, Morgan, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Neell, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Taber, Van Auken, Van Tromp, and Wood—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Brownell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Daves, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, William

Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wolker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—115.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Brooks, Broomall, Cake, Cuyode, Eggleston, Eliot, Fox, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Mercer, Morrissey, Pike, Selye, Sitgreaves, and Stone—18.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, to amend the first section of the bill by inserting after the words "I am" in line three, on page 2, the following:

Not excluded from the right to vote by the provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States;" that I am.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next question was upon the amendment proposed by Mr. BINGHAM to the fifth section of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. I call for the reading of that fifth section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if according to said returns the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

The amendment of Mr. BINGHAM was to strike out the word "of" after the word "votes," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "given at said election by;" so that the clause would read as follows:

If according to said returns the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes given at said election by the electors qualified as herein specified, &c.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and there were—yeas 38, noes 70.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. BINGHAM called for the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—yeas sixteen.

So (the affirmative being not one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DRIGGS (at twenty-five minutes before four o'clock p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. CHANLER called for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the rule be suspended which requires the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

The question was taken upon suspending the rule; and there were—yeas one hundred and two, noes not counted.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rule was suspended.

The bill was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill, upon which

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 27, not voting 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. So the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the bill as just passed be printed. It may be necessary for the information of the Senate. The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GARFIELD asked and obtained leave of absence for the remainder of the present week.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GARFIELD asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Miss Sue Murphy.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to this House the expenses incurred for the revenue-cutter service for the last fiscal year; also the value of all seizures made by revenue-cutters, and all fines, penalties, and forfeitures that have accrued therefrom during said period.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

SYMPATHY AND AID FOR IRELAND.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas the Government of Great Britain did, so soon as an armed rebellion appeared within the limits of the United States, hasten to accord to the rebels belligerent rights, and thereafter, during the whole course of the war, continued to give moral and material aid to the same, furnishing them with arms, munitions, and vessels of war, inflicting thereby incalculable injury upon our foreign commerce and greatly increasing our sacrifices of men and money in the suppression of the rebellion; and whereas the said Government of Great Britain has hitherto refused to pay the Government of the United States for any part of the enormous damage so inflicted upon the commerce of the United States; and whereas the Irish people, after having suffered for centuries the burdens of a hereditary aristocracy, an established church, and a system of laws designed expressly for their impoverishment, have at last risen in rebellion, and are now waging a gallant, though unequal contest with the Government of Great Britain: Therefore,

Resolved, That the profoundest sympathies of the American people are enlisted in behalf of the people of Ireland in their efforts to establish a republican government in Ireland upon the basis of universal suffrage and a total separation of church and State.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs are hereby instructed to report to this House what legislation, if any, is necessary to enable the Executive of the United States to accord to the people of Ireland belligerent rights, and generally to enable the Executive to follow in every particular the precedents established by Great Britain during the late rebellion.

—Mr. STEVENS. I object.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move to suspend the rules so as to allow the introduction and consideration of the resolutions.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House adjourn.

On the motion, there were—ayes eighty-three, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio: The petition of J. C. Norton and others, of Highland county, Ohio, praying for a pension to the minor heirs of Pleasant Stoops, deceased.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of 12 wounded soldiers who were kept against their will in the United States hospital at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, five and seven months after their regiments were mustered out of the service, and then discharged without pay for the time served after the mustering out of their regiments, who claim and pray Congress to grant them full pay and clothing allowance, &c., up to the day of their discharge from the hospital.

Also, the petition of the officers of the Anti-Slavery Society of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to prohibit the importation into the United States of sugars and other articles of foreign commerce which are the products of slave labor, &c.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Norristown, Pennsylvania, late officers of the volunteer United States Army, praying Congress to pass an act entitling all officers of the late volunteer Army of the United States who have been commissioned since March 3, 1865, to the three months' extra pay allowed to all officers who served as such before the passage of said act, which act deprives officers from receiving said pay who were commissioned after the passage of the act of March 3, 1865.

By Mr. KOONTZ: The petition of Mary E. Seag, asking for compensation for services rendered the United States during the late war.

By Mr. RICE: The petition of citizens of the city of Washington, asking for the granting of a charter for the construction of a railroad from Washington city to Cincinnati, Ohio.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 12, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation for additional surveys of the Wisconsin river, and for employing a dredge-boat to ascertain how far it is practicable to improve that river; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of William H. Kimball, late regimental quartermaster of the eleventh regiment Minnesota volunteers, praying to be paid as such from October 10, 1862, to May 18, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COLE presented a memorial of Henry A. Palmer and others, bonded clerks in the United States branch mint at San Francisco, for increased compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORTON presented a memorial of the officers of the Minnesota and Missouri River Railroad Company, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of their road; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George L. Elder, second lieutenant, company D, ninety-ninth regiment New York volunteers, praying that officers of that regiment who served on the frigate Congress when attacked and destroyed by the rebel ram Merrimac may be compensated for their losses, to report it back and asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims. And I desire to say that, upon due consideration, the Committee on Naval Affairs have come to the conclusion that they will no longer entertain any cases that are purely or substantially claim cases, but will propose to refer them in all instances when they shall be committed to their consideration to the Committee on Claims, where they properly belong. I trust, therefore, no more cases of that kind will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee, to report it with an amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope that resolution will be considered now.

Mr. WILSON. I trust there will be no objection to its immediate consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, seamen, and marines, or their heirs; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Governments of France and Prussia touching the claim asserted by the latter to the military service of persons born in those countries who have since become naturalized under the laws of the United States, reported a motion to print the correspondence for the use of the Senate; and the motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 45) for the defense of the northeastern frontier, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 47) to provide for the adjustment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislature of Oregon, in favor of a reciprocity treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian Government, asked to be discharged from its consideration; which was agreed to.

WRECK OF THE SCOTLAND.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report a bill to repeal a joint resolution entitled "A resolution to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland," approved January 29, 1867. I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to hear from the honorable member a statement of the reasons why the committee deem it necessary to repeal the joint resolution referred to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state very briefly. On the petition of the Board of Underwriters and the Harbor Commissioners of New York, Congress at the last session appropriated a sum of money, not to exceed $100,000, for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland from the harbor of New York. Upon investigation by the engineers, it has been ascertained that the cargo of the Scotland is very valuable, as is likewise the hull, and that the owners of the Scotland have already made a contract with the wreckers of New York to remove the obstacle. This bill merely saves $100,000 to the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is right; it ought to be repealed.

The bill (S. No. 49) to repeal a joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland," approved January 29, 1867, was read three times, and passed.

JOHN H. ELLIS.

Mr. WILLEY. I am authorized by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 25) for the relief of John H. Ellis, paymaster United States Army, to report it back and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration; the case has been carefully considered by the committee.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the allowance to John H. Ellis, in the settlement of his accounts as paymaster, of $3,673 91, being the amount lost in consequence of the larceny of $19,093 91 of the public moneys from his custody at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, on the night of January 1, 1866, if the Paymaster General shall deem him justly entitled to this credit, and shall certify his approval of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARKET SQUARE, BURLINGTON, IOWA.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 22) in relation to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration. It is simply to relinquish the title of the United States to a public square, called Market square, in Burlington. The city government proposes to allow the Burlington and Missouri River railroad to lay its tracks on the square; and this bill is to relinquish the title of the United States to the city.

The bill was, by unanimous consent, considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 50) for the relief of William L. Kimball; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 51) to facilitate the establishment of a naval and marine coal depot on the eastern shore of New Jersey, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 52) to incorporate the Washington Land and Building Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 23) extending sympathy to the people of Ireland; which was read the first time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada ask for the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it had better lie over.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the resolution will be printed, so that we may see it to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to that. The joint resolution was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) relative to the payment of expenses incurred by the judges of election for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) to make valid the laws of New Mexico passed at the session of the Legislature, held at Santa Fé from the 3d day of December, 1866, to the 31st of January, 1867; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario for military, naval, and commercial purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 53) in addition to the several acts for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States and to resume the legislative powers delegated to the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the levy court in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 54) to enlarge the public grounds surrounding the Capitol; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce the following bills; which were read twice by their titles, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. No. 55) to enable the State of California to reclaim certain unproductive lands within her limits; and

A bill (S. No. 56) granting lands to aid in the construction of a canal or canals for irrigating purposes in the State of California.

EDWARD M'DONALD REYNOLDS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate the records of the retiring and revisory boards and all the proceedings in the matter of the dismissal of Captain Edward McDonald Reynolds from the Marine corps.

GOVERNMENT FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the organization and equipment of the Government fire department of the city of Washington, the number of men, horses, engines, and ambulances employed, and the total monthly cost of the same; also whether the expense cannot be materially reduced, or whether any additional legislation is necessary to promote the efficiency of said fire department.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that Mr. CHARLES H. VAN WYCK of New York, Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. JOHN A. LOGAN of Illinois, Mr. MARTIN WELKER of Ohio, and Mr. GEORGE A. HALSEY of New Jersey, had been appointed members of the joint select Committee on Retrenchment on the part of the House; and also that Mr. R. P. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. F. C. BEAMAN of Michigan, and Mr. A. J. GLOSSBRENNER of Pennsylvania, had been appointed members of the joint Committee to Examine the Accounts for Repairs and Furnishing of the Executive Mansion on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the expenses of commissioners sent by the President to the Indian country;

A bill (S. No. 31) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States,'" approved March 21, 1866;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) supplementary to other joint resolutions to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) extending the time for the completion of the improvement of Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary.

ARMS OF DELAWARE.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to cause to be returned to the several armories in the State of Delaware the arms and equipments belonging to said State which were seized and carried therefrom by direction of the military authorities during the late civil war, or to supply said armories with arms and equipments of equal value.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose the Senator does not want that resolution considered to-day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to have it considered now.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose it would have to be referred before the Senate would like to act upon it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no objection to its being referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

DONAHUE, RYAN, AND SECOR.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of joint resolution No. 17.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) for the relief of Donahue, Ryan, & Secor, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate for the purpose of paying Donahue, Ryan, & Secor for losses sustained by them in the construction of the monitor Camanche, the sum of $179,000 80.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say in explanation to the Senate that this is precisely such a joint resolution as the Senate passed unanimously at its last session, approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs, but it was not enabled to be reached in the other House by reason of the rules of that body and the pressure of public business. It is a case not comprehended in the act passed for the relief of builders of iron-clads, and is on all hands acknowledged to be eminently just and worthy of immediate attention. The case of these builders is peculiar, inasmuch as their losses were the result, as is well established, of the acts of the Government of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take from the table the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts, which were yesterday laid on the table by a vote of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. SUMNER on the 7th instant:

Resolutions declaring certain further guarantees required in the reconstruction of the rebel States.

1. Resolved, That Congress, in declaring by positive legislation that it possesses paramount authority over the rebel States, and in prescribing that no person therein shall be excluded from the elective franchise by reason of race, color, or previous condition, has begun the work of reconstruction, and has set an example to itself.

2. Resolved, That there are other things remaining to be done, which are as clearly within the power of Congress as the elective franchise, and it is the duty of Congress to see that these things are not left undone.

3. Resolved, That among the things remaining to be done are the five following:

First. The existing governments, which have been declared to be illegal, must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction, and will cease to exercise a pernicious influence.

Secondly. Provisional governments must be constituted as temporary substitutes for the illegal governments, with special authority to superintend the transition to permanent governments, republican in form.

Thirdly. As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

Fourthly. As the education of the people is essential to the national welfare, and especially to the development of those principles of justice and morality which constitute the foundation of republican government, and as, according to the census, an immense proportion of the people in the rebel States, without distinction of color, cannot read and write, therefore public schools must be established for the equal good of all.

Fifthly. Not less important than education is the homestead, which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

4. Resolved, That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I voted yesterday against laying these resolutions on the table, because I was unwilling to terminate the debate at that time, and because there is one proposition contained in them that I think of vital importance. I dissent entirely from the argument made by several Senators yesterday, that the act which was passed a few days ago is to be regarded in the nature of a pledge, and that we cannot now alter or amend it without a breach of faith. The House of Representatives, I understand, has already passed a bill, which will be here for consideration in a day or two, proposing to perfect that measure in several respects; but independent of that, the offer, as it is called, has not yet been accepted by any of the southern States; it has not been acted upon by them, no rights have vested under it. It cannot be regarded in the nature of a contract, because that takes two parties, one to propose and the other to accept. Consequently it is entirely competent for Congress to alter, amend, modify, or even repeal that bill without dishonor or breach of faith.

While there is much in the resolutions offered by the Senator from Massachusetts that I cannot approve, I desire to say that I do approve most fully what they say upon the subject of the necessity of providing for the education of the people of the late rebel States. I think that is of vital importance, not only to them, but to the whole country, and that we of the North are as much interested in it as they of the South. They are to be our assistant law-makers, to join with us in electing Senators, Representatives, Vice Presidents, and Presidents, and we are to be affected by their competency or incompetency to exercise the right of suffrage. The bill which we have passed will probably bring to the polls in the late rebel States not less than seven hundred thousand new voters, of whom but a small proportion can read and write; and of the white people of the South it is well known that a large portion cannot read and write. When you add to the number of whites who cannot read and write the whole number of colored people who cannot read and write, you will find that both classes in that category will probably constitute a full half, if not more, of all the voters in the rebel States under the late act of Congress.

Sir, the opposition which has existed in the North to conferring the right of suffrage upon the freedmen of the South has arisen more from the consideration of their ignorance, their want of education, than from any prejudice on the subject of color. I think I speak advisedly on that subject. Of the people in the South who can read and write, of the educated classes, an overwhelming majority have been rebels, and are now rebels in feeling and sympathy. Not only are they rebels, but the educated classes own and hold nearly all the property, and they will control these new State governments. Intelligence has always prevailed against numbers, and always will; and legislate as you may the present educated classes of the people of the South will control the new State governments, and they will continue to do so until you educate all the other classes of the southern people. If you expect to take these new organizations out of the hands of the rebel classes of the South, it must be done by educating all the other people there. It is well known that a large number of southern men, especially those who have been slaveholders, have been in favor of colored suffrage for months past. They have been in favor of it upon the ground that their late slaves are ignorant and that they can control them. That they will be able to do this to a large extent we cannot deny, and the only way in which we can take the control of the colored people of the South out of the hands of their late masters is by educating them.

The Constitution requires "that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." Sir, that guarantee cannot be executed in the southern States unless the people of these States are educated. We cannot maintain and execute that guarantee where one half or four sevenths of all the voters can neither read nor write. It is of the very essence of reconstruction that these people shall be educated. We cannot expect successfully to carry on loyal State governments in the South and to reconstruct society upon a permanent basis of loyalty unless there shall be a system of common schools established open and free to all, without distinction of race or color.

It has been said by several Senators with whom I have conversed that we must leave this matter to the people of the several States. Why, sir, it has always been to the interest of the people of the South that they should educate the poor whites, but they have not done it. The leading classes kept them in ignorance because they could thereby the more readily control them, and the educated classes of the South will now refuse to establish voluntarily a system of common schools, especially when they hold the property, and the taxes necessary to be raised for that purpose must be collected off their property. They will never do it unless they are coerced to it by the terms of reconstruction. Sir, we cannot reasonably expect, we have no right to expect, that these men will come forward voluntarily and establish a system of common schools to be supported by taxation, when the rebel educated classes hold the property and will have to pay the taxes.

It has been said by one or two Senators with whom I have conversed on this subject, that it will be time enough to raise this question when these States come here with their constitutions. I say, sir, not so. Let us now lay down all the conditions that we expect to demand; let us now prescribe all the terms which we expect them to comply with in their constitutions. It will not do when they come here to say to them, "Your constitutions are not complete, because they contain no provision upon the subject of education." That will require them to go back to the people, and will involve the calling of new conventions. That might, perhaps, be properly regarded as a breach of faith. Let us now prescribe all the conditions that we mean to require them to insert a provision in their State constitutions making it obligatory upon their Legislatures to establish a system of common schools, open and free to all, without regard to race or color, now is the time to prescribe it, and not when they have formed their constitutions, and come here and ask their acceptance and for an admission of representation under them.

Now, sir, have we not a perfect right to make this requirement of them? If we have a right to require that they shall establish universal suffrage in their constitutions, we have an equal right to require them to make some provision to qualify men to exercise the right of suffrage. The education of the people is essential to the execution of the guarantee that we shall secure to each State a republican form of government; it is indispensable to the success of republican government; and we cannot hope for successful reconstruction except upon the basis of making provision for the speedy education of all the people of the South. We cannot leave this to the gradual progress of events. We have brought to the polls by the late act of Congress some seven hundred thousand men who but three or four years ago were slaves, most of them plantation slaves, but very few of whom can read and write. The condition of the country has made it necessary that they should be suddenly brought to the polls, and without previous preparation by education; and now that it is done, it is a matter of the first importance to the people of this country that we make positive provision for the education of these men. It is due to them and it is also due to our own people that this should be done. We cannot afford to trust to chance upon so important a point. I therefore deem that part of the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts as of vital importance, and if it is competent for us to pass a supplementary bill to perfect the reconstruction bill passed but a few days ago, it is competent for us to put into that bill this proposition contained in the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts. The importance of it cannot for one moment be overestimated.

Something was said in the discussion of yesterday with regard to the status of the rebel States. I do not know that it is pertinent to this discussion to argue that question. I can only say that on that point I have always differed from the Senator from Massachusetts; I have always believed that these rebel States were States in the Union, but with illegal and unauthorized governments, and I have never seen any necessity for what is called the territorial theory. Congress from the first has had, under the Constitution, all the powers necessary for the work of reconstruction, without treating these States as conquered provinces and as having been reduced to a territorial condition. The rebellion was suppressed upon the theory that they were States whose people were in insurrection. Acting on that theory, at the close of the war we found these States without government of any kind; and the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States attached, and it has not yet been discharged. We are bound to guaranty republican forms of government to all these States, and when we found ten States without governments at all our jurisdiction attached at once, and it can only be discharged by the full and successful establishment of republican State governments.

But, sir, to come back to the main question, can we hope to do that successfully, can we hope to execute that guarantee to the satisfaction of the people of this country if we shall fail to make provision for the speedy and certain education of the people of all the rebel States?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, for one I feel very much obliged to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] for bringing back into this Chamber this ghost of Banquo. I am obliged to him because I was not at all satisfied with the way in which it was dismissed yesterday. I was obliged to vote against laying these resolutions upon the table; and, as it happened, I was obliged to vote so without offering to the Senate a single reason which controlled me in giving that vote; and the debate had taken such a strange and singular range, as it seemed to me, that I felt somewhat placed in a false position in giving that vote. I am glad, therefore, to have a legitimate opportunity afforded me of saying in a few words why I gave the vote I did.

In the first place, Mr. President, allow me to remark that this is not a proposition to legislate. Here is not a bill before the Senate. It is not proposed to enact one or all of these things into a law now and here. These are resolutions for adoption or rejection by the Senate, and not by the Congress of the United States; and it seems to me before we condemn them we should look right into the matter and see if there is anything there worthy of condemnation. As I read them they seem to me to be but little more than a series of truisms; but because they are truisms it does not follow that it would not be proper for us to declare our assent to them. See what they are. The first resolution declares—

That Congress, in declaring by positive legislation that it possesses paramount authority over the rebel States, and in prescribing that no person therein shall be excluded from the elective franchise by reason of race, color, or previous condition, has begun the work of reconstruction, and has set an example to itself.

Is that true or not? "Has" thereby "begun the work of reconstruction," says the resolution. I conceive it has so, though perhaps rather in a figurative than a literal sense. In making that declaration in the recent enactment of Congress, it did not do much in the way of actual reconstruction, but it did a great deal in the way of preparing the way for reconstruction. In making that declaration, we tore down the great obstacle which stood in the way of reconstruction; we prepared the ground for the work of reconstruction. The great obstacle before which the Congress and the nation has stood in pause for the last year and a half has been the existence of those political organizations down there which claimed to be the governments of States, which arrogated to themselves the prerogatives of States, and Congress, and the people to some extent, but to a far less extent than was true of Congress, hesitated before the necessity of denying to those organizations the character which they thus usurped for themselves. In the recent enactment of Congress, however, that step has been taken; that work has been done; that declaration has gone forth. You have stripped those organizations of these assumed characteristics. They no longer stand in the eye of your law, as they never have stood in the eye of the loyal American people, in the light of American State governments. Thus, then, by that declaration you have begun the work of reconstruction, as he who tears down an old, rotten, shelterless fabric upon a site where he wishes to build has commenced the work of erecting an elegant edifice suited to the accommodation of man.

The second resolution declares:

That there are other things remaining to be done which are as clearly within the power of Congress as the elective franchise, and it is the duty of Congress to see that these things are not left undone.

Is that not true, that there are other things as clearly within the power of Congress as this matter of decreeing the elective franchise to every male adult person within those districts? Why, Mr. President, if we will comprehend the spirit and scope of the recent enactment of Congress, it is nothing short of this: you have asserted the same measure of supremacy over every one of those communities that you have exercised over the Territory of Montana or any other Territory which ever existed under the Constitution of the United States. You have the same authority, the same legislative control over all those communities, if your law is a valid law, that you have over the people of the District of Columbia; and if you have that authority, then you are just as responsible for good or bad government in South Carolina as you are in the District of Columbia; and you cannot escape it. They are States or not States. If they are States they are just what New York and Massachusetts are, and you can do no more toward regulating the suffrage or anything else there than you can do in New York or Massachusetts. If they are not States, as your law declares they are not in effect, then you can do there whatever you can do in any portion of the Union where a State government does not exist, and in every such portion of the Union you can do just what you can in the District of Columbia, just what you can in any one of your Territories.

The next resolution declares that there are five things which yet ought to be done, and the first is that—

The existing governments which have been declared to be illegal must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction, and will cease to exercise a pernicious influence.

Mr. President, I do humbly conceive that those governments down there ought to be vacated. The Senate will bear me witness I have insisted upon that persistently for more than three years. They ought to be vacated. They ought to be vacated because you declared them to be illegal and because you declared them to be criminal—criminal in that they did not give adequate protection to life or to property. When a political organization is liable to that impeachment; when you can say of any political organization within the limits of the United States, within its jurisdiction, that it is illegal, and that it does not afford adequate protection to life or property, you have declared the only two conditions upon which arises the plain duty of the Congress of the United States to remove them from the face of the earth. And I was profoundly sorry to have to acquiesce in that feature of the recent enactment which stigmatized those organizations, stigmatized them, I say, which characterized them in this way, and yet proposed to employ them still further in the work of government, not because I particularly distrust their agency in what is called the work of reconstruction; I distrust them still more in the every day work of administering justice down there between man and man. The work of reconstruction, since you have declared them to be provisional governments rather than State governments, we can manage very well; but I regret profoundly to see those organizations which you declare to be illegal and to be wanting in the first duties of government, engaged day after day in enacting laws, in administering laws, in determining private rights, in imposing human penalties, when, if I have not strongly misjudged them, and if your enactment does not strongly misjudge them, they are not fit to be intrusted with any one of those great and solemn duties. I think they ought, in the language of these resolutions, to be vacated at once and set aside. Other governments, better governments, truer governments, and governments which can afford adequate protection to life and property, provisional like these, ought to be put in their stead.

Third, it is said that—

As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent governments, republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

That, as I understand it, is but little more than the sentiment which animates the late enactment, not going one word or line beyond the scope and spirit of that enactment. It is a reaffirmation of it.

The fourth proposition I regard as more important than either of the preceding. It is that—

As the education of the people is essential to the national welfare, and especially to the development of those principles of justice and morality which constitute the foundation of republican government, and as, according to the census, an immense proportion of the people in the rebel States, without distinction of color, cannot read and write, therefore public schools must be established for the equal good of all.

Mr. President, I would be sorry to see an American Senator in the year of our Lord 1867 take issue with a single sentiment contained in that resolution. I would be sorry to find an American Senator who would stand up in the face of our recent experiences and deny that education is essential to the national welfare, as this proposition declares it to be. Mr. President, think of it as you may, dream of it as much as you please, God's truth is, and it is man's truth, too, you cannot maintain republican principles and republican forms of government over a people where education is not, and is not universal. For a time the attempt may succeed, but sooner or later it must fail. Your institutions are stronger or weaker just in proportion as education is more or less general among the people of the United States. In those portions of the country where education is most universal there your institutions are the strongest and the most stable to-day, and have always been.

I shall not occupy the time of the Senate with any extended remarks in justification of this proposition. Nobody has assailed it; nobody will. Nobody here will deny the truth of this proposition. But the national Government has for years declared this necessity and has, as it had the means and opportunity for doing it, done what it could to promote the cause of education. It has done it in the administration of the public domain. It has made large donations of the public domain from time to time to promote the cause of education in the States, not only where the public lands were, but where the public lands were not. You made a very large donation of lands but a few years since, since I have had the honor of a seat in this Chamber, to endow colleges in all of the States. You did it for the promotion of that which was unnecessary, or you did it for the promotion of that which you deemed to be necessary. I think it was the judgment of Congress that education was necessary, and that that was the reason which induced them to make that donation.

Not less important than education is the homestead—is the fifth proposition—

which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

If I desired to dissent from any proposition in these resolutions, it would be upon this—not that I am disposed to deny that a homestead is necessary—but I cannot agree that a homestead is as necessary as education. A homestead is necessary for the comfort and the well-being of every American citizen, and your laws should, and if I am not mistaken your laws do, provide that every American citizen may have a homestead, and may have a homestead upon the same terms. I am not prepared to say that any further legislation is necessary in this behalf. I am not prepared to say that your present laws do not afford all the facilities to the American people for obtaining homesteads that you can properly afford them. I am inclined to think they do. I do not know just now what further legislation in that direction is required; but I assent to the truth of the proposition that a homestead is necessary.

The fourth resolution declares—

That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

If they are essential, as I have endeavored to show, and as I think no man has denied, to the national welfare, then it follows as a matter of course that they are essential to a just reconstruction; for if we are to have a reconstruction at all we only want that kind of reconstruction which will secure, and best secure, the national welfare.

But it is said that this is an exhibition of bad faith on the part of Congress; and it was upon that point that I desired more particularly to speak. I did not feel particularly called upon to defend the self-evident propositions, as I regard them, contained in these preceding resolutions; but I did wish to repudiate the allegation that we were guilty of bad faith if we declared our assent to these. What faith have we pledged to anybody? When did we plight that faith? That this militates against anything contained in the recent enactment I do deny. That we have ever contracted with the people in any one of those districts to any end whatever I deny. We have declared in the recent enactment two or three things: first, that the organizations under which they now exist are illegal and inefficient; secondly, that they must strip themselves of all pretense of State rights and State prerogatives; thirdly, that they must be subjected from that time forward to the power of the Government of the United States of America. But we have in the next place declared that in a certain way they may proceed to regain the character of States, and to regain the right of representation in these Halls. We have not told them that at any particular time, nor that upon any particular and specified terms, these great privileges and prerogatives shall be conceded to them again. We have told them certain things that they must do before they can reacquire these rights and prerogatives. We did not attempt to tell them all they should do. We have told them that among other things they must do this: they must remodel those instruments of government which they call their State constitutions. How? By a new convention. How to be elected? By the whole body of the people. What must that constitution contain we have not told them. Some things we have told them it must contain; but then the whole right and the whole authority of Congress over the subject we have reserved, since we have required them to submit the constitution, whenever framed, however framed, by whomsoever framed, to the Congress of the United States, and not because it is approved by the whole body of the people, but only when it shall be approved by the Congress of the United States do we hold out to them the promise of being readmitted to these Halls.

Now then, Mr. President, I say for one I do not care, what though the whole body of the people of South Carolina may be summoned to the choice of members of a convention to frame a new constitution for that community, what though that constitution shall decree suffrage to the whole body of her people forever, if I find any clause in that constitution when it shall be exhibited to me, if I should happen to hold a seat here, which shall militate against any right of any portion or class of her people which shall be calculated to render the right of suffrage nugatory and worthless to any portion of her people, it will not give satisfaction to me. This fourth resolution does not declare that they shall be excluded from the prerogatives of States until the whole body of their people shall be educated, but it declares substantially that the right to be educated shall be recognized; that the right for all people in all those communities to be educated shall be recognized, and not that we shall wait until education is actually conferred. But if they should submit to me hereafter a constitution which should shut up the common schools from the enjoyment of a large portion of their people, white or black, if they should show me in any one of their organized laws a single provision denying the right to education to any portion of the people in those districts, Mr. President, I should sit here until the walls of this Capitol rotted down before I would vote to reclothe such a community with the prerogatives of a State. But if they come to me with a constitution which throws open the school-houses, which admits the right of poor and rich, of white and black, to receive that education without which no man can be fitted for an American citizen, I will concede to the State of South Carolina, thus professing that disposition, the right, and concede to her the duty of carrying on that work of education, as I concede it to the people of Massachusetts and Wisconsin to-day. If they say they will not assume that duty, if they say they will not assume that responsibility, I shall answer them that I will concede to them no one of the duties, and no one of the responsibilities, and no one of the prerogatives of an American State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was about to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, but before submitting that motion I will ask to have the bill which has come from the House of Representatives and is now on the table taken up and referred.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a few moments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This discussion may take all day, and I am anxious to do the business of this session.

Mr. GRIMES, (to Mr. SUMNER.) Somebody else will want to reply to you.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly; and we shall not get through in a month the way we are going on.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion for a few moments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would certainly withdraw it for a few minutes, but I can see that this is an interminable discussion; and for one I am anxious to do the business necessary to be done, to get it out of the way. I must, therefore, insist on my motion.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is now on going into executive session.

Mr. GRIMES. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is not debatable.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly it is debatable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. To a limited extent.

Mr. SUMNER. I mean only to debate it to a limited extent. I do not mean to trespass on my friend. I had not intended to occupy the attention of the Senate at any length on this occasion. I wish, however, to congratulate the country and the Senate on the voice of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I feel personally grateful to him—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Massachusetts is not discussing the question of going into executive session.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make the point of order that a discussion in reference to congratulating the Senator from Indiana on the question of reconstruction has nothing to do with the question of going into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The custom has been to permit a limited discussion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. However much the course of the Senator from Indiana may be approved by the Senator from Massachusetts, we have business to attend to here, and the Senator can offer his congratulation privately as well as publicly.

Mr. SUMNER. I choose to express it publicly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I choose, then, to insist upon the point that the Senator is out of order.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; then I shall take the ruling of the Chair. I understand the rules of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator understands everything far better than all the rest of us; but we have rights here and can make our points.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe the custom has been to permit a limited discussion on a motion to go into executive session, perhaps not a wide range, and I do not profess to know exactly what the limitation is; but any remarks showing that it would be improper to go into executive session would of course be in order.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is whether we shall go into executive session, and on that I may assign reasons for continuing now in public session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I submit that the Senator has no right, in assigning his reasons, to argue a question before the Senate of general legislation or otherwise.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not propose to argue any question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You were beginning to argue it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will pardon me, I was not beginning to argue it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot dignify it by the name of argument, but you were beginning to talk about it.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; that is another thing. It is always in order to make a comparison between the different questions before the Senate. The question now is, Shall we go into executive session? Then you may compare the importance of that duty with the importance of the other measures pending. I have no purpose to occupy time; but, considering that the proposition which has been under debate was one which I had introduced myself, I did think that I should not take any great liberty if, before going into executive session, I expressed my gratitude to the Senator from Indiana for the contribution he has given to the cause of education. I desired to say that, and I hoped that the Senate would give me that privilege before this question was closed to-day by going into executive session.

Mr. GRIMES. Now you have had it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says, now I have had it. I have had it, and I believe that I have been in order in expressing it. I shall not, however, proceed with the further consideration of this matter, but give notice that at the proper time, when the bill supplementary to the military bill shall be before the Senate, I shall move a proposition in order to secure education so far as possible in the rebel States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 12, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. PAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. PAINE. I rose to a privileged motion, that is that this House adjourn, but I will withdraw it until the gentleman from Vermont makes his statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, a resolution was introduced yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] touching the action of the last Congress in regard to the claim of the heirs of John E. Bouligny. I stated when I objected to the introduction of the resolution that it was not true in its statement of facts. I do not wish to be discourteous to any gentleman upon the floor of the House, and perhaps it may be inferred from my language that I intended to make the charge that the gentleman was designedly false in his statements. I had no such intention, and if the gentleman from Wisconsin supposes I am capable of such discourtesy I have only to assure him that he is mistaken.

I still think that a part of the resolution was erroneous, and that the gentleman misapprehended the facts in the case. I refer to that portion which states this claim to be fraudulent. That statement certainly is erroneous; and fairly implies that either the committee which reported the bill were grossly imposed upon or favored a claim which they knew to be fraudulent. The statement that the bill passed without any discussion might convey the impression that the committee sought some peculiarly favorable opportunity for putting the bill upon its passage. In reply, I can only say that the bill was called up upon the first and only opportunity of which, under the rules; they could avail themselves.

I will say, however, in justice to the gentleman from Wisconsin, as he has requested me to do so, that the language he quoted from the decision of the Supreme Court in 15 Howard, so far as I have had an opportunity to examine it, is correct. I have not given the language of the opinion careful attention from want of time, but the gentleman assures me that he used the language of the Supreme Court in the opinion as delivered by Justice Nelson. From the examination I have made, connected with the gentleman's assurances to me, I am willing to say that his quotations are correct. I must be permitted, however, to say, sir, that from my recollection of the case cited by the gentleman, the decision was based solely upon the ground of jurisdiction.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of the SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. NIBLACK.

H. D. MCKINNEY.

On motion of the SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of H. D. McKinney.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I ask leave to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose it was the intention of the gentleman from Vermont to attribute to me the offering of a resolution which contained a falsehood, though I confess his language bears that construction. I find it reported in the Globe as follows:

"Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I object. The facts stated in the resolution are not true."

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I am perfectly familiar with this case, and I am certain that the facts stated are true."

And I reiterate here to-day that every fact stated therein is true. I served on the Committee on Private Land Claims four years, and this is an old acquaintance of mine; and I will say to the House a more fraudulent claim was never presented to the Congress of the United States. If gentlemen will only read the decision of the Supreme Court referred to they will see that it is a fraudulent claim.

The bill passed not merely sanctions this claim to the amount of seventy-five thousand acres of land, but a claim to the amount of four hundred and fifty thousand acres and other claims will be legalized, which will require millions on millions of acres to satisfy them. But let me read what the gentleman from Vermont said further:

"Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I was a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims which reported this case to the last Congress, and I state that the facts set forth in the preamble to this joint resolution are not true."

That, sir, was pretty rough language, and if the House will indulge me briefly I think that I shall not only be able to show that it is true, but that it was my duty, not only to bring the matter to the attention of the House, but to endeavor to arrest, as far as I could, the execution of a law, founded as I knew upon an entire misapprehension of facts and one that is grossly unjust to the people of the United States.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I must object to the gentleman going into a history of the case upon a mere personal explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I wish to justify myself, and show to the House that I did not offer a resolution that was false.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has unanimous consent to make a personal explanation; the Chair therefore cannot restrain any explanation bearing directly upon the joint resolution which he desired to introduce yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I intend to confine myself to this resolution, and to show that I did not state in the preamble things that were untrue. I wish, as I said before, to state the history of this case.

The first time it ever appeared before Congress that I am aware of was in the Thirty-Fifth Congress. I was then a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the Hon. Mr. Sandige, of Louisiana, a very fair and honest man, was chairman of that committee, and one well versed in Louisiana land claims, and he considered it so fraudulent that he did not think it worth a report; but he signed a paper, which I joined him in signing, and it was put on file, calling attention to the fact that it had been fully adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States and declared fraudulent and void. That paper was left on file.

In the Thirty-Sixth Congress the Committee on Private Land Claims was constituted of such patriots as Thomas Hineman of Arkansas, George Hawkins of Florida, William F. Avery of Tennessee, and Mr. Bouigny, the gentleman whose heirs are interested in this case, was also on the committee. At the request of Mr. Bouigny the papers in the case were given to General Hineman. According to my present recollection he wrote the report, although in consequence of his absence from the city it was submitted to the House by a member from the State of Missouri. The report was adopted in the committee by a majority of a quorum when I was absent, and it was passed through this House without objection, having been called up one morning just after the reading of the Journal, when no one was listening, by Mr. Davidson, of Louisiana, a venerable, gray-haired man, who walked with a crutch, and to whom the House was very kindly disposed. It is the report made on that occasion that has produced all the mischief since; for I find that in all reports and speeches that have been made since the statements of that report are adopted. That report was made just before the breaking out of the rebellion, and a number of the members of the committee no doubt thought they were doing good service in robbing the Government of all they could before leaving it. It went from here to the Senate, and was pending there, and was being pressed there with great pertinacity at the time the southern States seceded, and up to the time of the adjournment of the Thirty-Sixth Congress.

Now, great credit has been claimed for Mr. Bouigny, because while others were faithless he remained here faithful. I give him great credit for his patriotic conduct, and would not detract one iota from the merit which properly belongs to him on account of the course he pursued on that occasion. But it is not improper that facts should be stated. The public can draw such inferences as they choose from the facts.

When the associates of Mr. Bouigny withdrew from this Hall a bill was pending in the Senate, and which, as I have said, was being urged there with great pertinacity, which was to give him and his friends four hundred and fifty thousand acres of land. Well might he rise in his place and declare that he would stand by the flag. But, sir, I never heard, although he stood by the flag, that he ever raised a finger in its defense. Nor will I intimate that he was influenced in any way by the fact that he was to get by remaining here a land grant amounting to four hundred and fifty thousand acres. I merely state facts, and will draw no inference, certainly none prejudicial to the good name of a man who uttered patriotic words grateful for us then to hear; and we did not care to inquire then, nor do I now, as to motives.

But to come back to the origin of this claim, if claim it may be called. Sir, it is a part of the Mississippi scheme; it is a part of that grant said to have been made by the King of France to John Law and his associates, known by his connection with the South Sea bubble, and if there was any validity in that grant, as this act declares, then, sir, tens of millions of acres will not satisfy it. This claim purports to have been the Western or Mississippi Company, and had its origin in 1717, just one hundred and fifty years ago; and in the following year it is claimed that said Western or Mississippi Company sold this tract in question to one Paris Duvernay; and it is alleged that said Duvernay, by his agent, forty-seven years afterward sold it to Bernard d'Autrive, the ancestor, as it is claimed, of J. E. Bouigny. The Supreme Court say in their decision (14 Howard) that d'Autrive died in 1769, leaving four sons, the last one of whom lived until 1820, and yet, say the court, these sons never set up any claim for this land during their lifetime; but in 1835 Congress passed an act authorizing registers and receivers to examine and report upon private land claims. This act operated as an invitation to fish up many old claims, and then it was that this claim first took any form, although one hundred and seventeen years had elapsed since its origin. The register and receiver recommended the confirmation of the claim; and one reason they assigned therefor was that the land was nearly or quite all swamp and valueless. The case was reviewed by Hon. M. Burchard, Solicitor of the General Land Office in 1836, and he declared that the claim was invalid and void.

Again, Congress passed a law in 1844 authorizing private land claimants to go into the United States courts, and this case was heard in the district court for Louisiana, and a decree entered in favor of its validity. I have not been able to find that the case was contested before that court, but it was brought before the United States court and a full hearing had, and such action taken as I have declared in the resolution.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] is now constrained to say, as an act of justice to me, that I have correctly stated in the resolution the decision of the Supreme Court, but thinks there are other errors of statement in the resolution; but he does not point them out. Let us see if it be so. What says the resolution? It declares that Judge Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says that there is no record evidence either at Paris or New Orleans showing the existence of any such claim, though the archives had been diligently searched to find such evidence. He further says that "there is not the slightest ground for the claim set up" to a tract of land running back to Atchafalaya, and that by no grant or survey could the parties claim over twenty-five hundred or three thousand acres, instead of nearly half a million. So much of the resolution, then, the gentleman admits to be true. Well, what further does it say? Simply that Hon. M. Burchard, Solicitor of the General Land Office in 1836, reviewed the case and pronounced it void. The gentleman will not deny that, and if he does I only have to refer him to Senate Document No. 197, second session Twenty-Fifth Congress, and he will there find it. The only remaining statement of fact is, that the claims originated in 1717, and he certainly will not deny that, for if he does I have only to refer him to the report of his own committee. I think I have said enough to show that there is no error of statement in that resolution. Now, Mr. Speaker, this claim, if it originated at all, originated, by the showing of this committee, just one hundred and fifty years ago. The claimant, Bernard d'Autrive, died ninety-eight years ago, leaving four sons, the last of whom died about 1820, the Supreme Court say.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Vermont to rise in his place and say if he can that there was a particle of evidence produced before the Committee on Private Land Claims to show that J. E. Bouligny was the heir of Bernard d'Autrive, who died ninety-eight years ago, and if there was such evidence, to state the character of such evidence, and upon what basis they give him one sixth part of the claim. The House will see at a glance how improbable it is to suppose that, allowing Bouligny was an heir, that he would be entitled to so large a share, for d'Autrive having left four children who grew up to man's estate, it is fair to presume that the heirs of d'Autrive, instead of counting six at this time, would more likely count six hundred.

I will here state that the papers in this case are not to be found, and for that reason I have failed to embody certain facts in that resolution lest I should not have the proof at hand to sustain them. If I could have got hold of those papers I am sure that I should have been able to make statements more startling than any yet made in regard to this claim.

I have already said that the register and receiver of the New Orleans land office, who first reported in favor of this claim, stated that it was worthless swamp land, and to the accuracy of that statement I can myself bear testimony; and yet for this worthless swamp land, which went to Louisiana under the swamp land act, you propose to issue land warrants in sums of eighty acres each, with authority to locate the same in any State or Territory in the Union upon the choicest lands of the Government subject to private entry.

This was the bill which the last House passed, and believing that they did not understand the case when they passed it I offered a resolution seeking to arrest, if possible, that which I believed to be a great outrage and which I now believe to be a great outrage.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Did I understand the gentleman correctly as saying that the bill authorizes the heirs of Bouligny to locate land warrants on any lands not otherwise taken up to the amount of seventy-five thousand acres?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is a most extraordinary provision.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It is, in my judgment, the most extraordinary case that ever came before the House. Sir, I have no wish to trespass upon the patience of the House; I merely wished to state the leading points in the case. I say again that I wish the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] to state if there was any evidence before the committee showing that John E. Bouligny was one of the legal heirs of Bernard d'Autrive, who died one hundred years ago. He left four sons; and it is not to be presumed that they have not multiplied, so that in dividing this property it would not be divided among more than six persons. It is more reasonable to suppose, as I before said, that if there are any heirs at all, instead of six there may be six hundred.

Had I not been perfectly familiar with this case, I should not have troubled the House by anything in relation to it. Coming here now, after an absence of six years, I did not feel like putting myself forward in the matter. But knowing that it was such an outrage upon the public, I felt that I would be faithless in the discharge of my duty if I did not bring the matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PAINE. I now renew my motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAINE. I merely withdrew the motion to adjourn to allow the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdrew his motion to adjourn, and the House granted unanimous consent for a personal explanation; which under the rules may continue for an hour.

Mr. PAINE. I will make this proposition, while this debate may be very interesting, inasmuch as there is no question before the House, it can be only fruitless and profitless. I therefore propose that the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE], with the unanimous consent of the House, allow the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] to introduce the joint resolution which he proposed yesterday, forbidding the Secretary of the Interior from executing a law which it is complained here is fraudulent.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I cannot consent to that.

Mr. PAINE. After the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] shall have concluded his remarks, I suppose my motion will be in order.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] obtains the floor after the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] resumes his seat, it will be in order for him to move an adjournment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the Chair what business there is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order will be the call of committees for reports; which the Chair supposes will be very few, if any. When that call shall have been concluded, the morning hour business will be exhausted, and the House can then proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table. When that business shall have been concluded, the call of States for resolutions will be resumed.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the Chair if under the call of States for resolutions the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] can then introduce his joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. He can.

Mr. DAWES. And if a majority of the House agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] in the importance of the measure which he advocates, they can refuse to adjourn until the call of States for resolutions is concluded.

The SPEAKER. When the States are called for resolutions, bills and joint resolutions can be introduced and passed, if they do not contain appropriations, and do not give rise to debate; and debate can be stopped by ordering the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. And that is within the power of a majority?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAWES. Then I hope the House will not adjourn until the call of States is so far carried out that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] can introduce his joint resolution.

Mr. PAINE. If there is to be a call of States for resolutions, I do not desire to have the House adjourn now.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I certainly shall enter upon no defense of Mr. Bouligny. I have understood that he was one of those pure patriots who adhered to the obligations of his oath, and through all the disaffections attending the commencement of the late rebellion stood by and revered the old flag. I only regret that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] should be willing to rake up the ashes of the dead, and cast opprobrium and contumely upon the memory of one who was admired for his patriotism and his fidelity to his duty.

I objected yesterday to the introduction of the joint resolution upon several grounds. In the first place the bill to which it referred had in former Congresses passed the Senate twice by a large vote, and the House three times, after receiving a thorough and honest investigation. But the adjournment of Congress occurring before the action of the two Houses could be had in concurrence, the bill failed to become a law until the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] for some reason which I cannot comprehend was so anxious and eager to defeat the measure which has three times received the sanction of this House, that before he took his seat in the present Congress he forwarded a letter to a member from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE], which was handed to a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, [Mr. HOTCHKISS], charging that the claim was groundless and should not receive a favorable consideration. Why, sir, even in the Thirty-Sixth Congress, the committee of which the gentleman [Mr. WASHBURN] was himself a member, reported a bill sustaining the claim, and the House granted the relief prayed for.

And now, sir, just after the passage of the bill by an overwhelming majority, the gentleman presents a resolution not only reflecting upon the action of the House and the Senate, but casting unjust aspersions upon the respective committees which gave it their careful, candid, and deliberate consideration. In justification of the House committee, I have only to say that the measure received the approbation of Mr. THAYER, of Pennsylvania, its chairman, who, as a lawyer, was in my judgment second to no one of that profession in the Thirty-Ninth Congress; of Mr. HOTCHKISS, of New York, who was one of the acknowledged guardians of the Treasury, and scented fraud as the hound scents the stag; of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KEAR], the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAYES], and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER], and of the other members of the committee, none of whom would, even in the judgment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, report favorably upon a measure without deliberate investigation, or be easily imposed upon by false and fraudulent representations.

Mr. BAKER and Mr. HAYES rose.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I yield first to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAYES.]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] to say that I concurred with other members of the committee in reporting favorably upon the measure to which he alludes.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I retract the statement if I am mistaken.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman is in error. The committee was called together to consider this matter during, I think, the last week of the last session. The majority of the committee had examined the matter, and were ready to vote in favor of the measure. Two members of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] and myself, had had no opportunity to examine it. The papers were very voluminous. The case was one requiring a good deal of investigation; and my recollection is very distinct that the gentleman from Illinois, as well as myself, declined at that time to take any part in deciding the case. We had no opportunity to make such an examination as was required in order to form an intelligent judgment. But a majority of the committee having examined the case, the chairman, as I understood, was authorized to report as the opinion of the majority that the measure ought to pass.

The papers, it is said by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN], cannot be found. I recollect that on that occasion I was not able to get the papers for examination, because another member of the committee desired them for the same purpose. I will state further that, after coming out of the committee, I went to the Law Library and found the case referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I read it hastily, and the impression it made upon my mind corresponded precisely with the statement embraced in the resolution presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I went to the chairman of the committee and said that such was the impression made upon my mind; but the majority of the committee had decided the matter, and I could do nothing. I did not know till I saw the statement in the papers that the measure had been called up and passed. If my attention had been attracted to the bill at the time of its passage I should have stated the impression I had received from reading the case in 15 Howard. I will say further that my present impression is that if the claim is a perfectly good one, as perhaps it may be, if it will bear examination, it seems to me right that we should, if possible, procure a postponement of action by the Department, and that the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin, or something similar to it, should be adopted.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire merely to say, and I want to say it very distinctly, that I did not concur in the favorable report of this claim. It came before the Committee on Private Land Claims late in the session; and in view of the complications of the claim I had not time to investigate it and form for myself a judgment upon its merits. A majority of the committee, most of them I believe old members of the committee, had, as I understood, considered the claim, and were favorable to it. So far as I expressed any opinion in reference to the matter at all, I was, from the slight information I had, inclined rather to be adverse to the claim than otherwise.

Yet I must refer to the position of my colleagues on the committee with entire respect. They examined the claim, as I supposed; they satisfied themselves it was right; they were in the majority, and they reported in favor of it to the House. It had the concurrence, I understand, of five members of the committee: the chairman, Mr. THAYER, who has been properly alluded to as a most excellent lawyer, and as I will add, beyond all peradventure a thoroughly honest man; the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOTCHKISS,] the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. NOELL,] making a clear majority of the committee.

I entirely concur in what my colleague on the committee from Ohio [Mr. HAYES] has said, that it would be well to open this matter again, and if there is any fraud in it let the fraud be defeated. I have no doubt if the claim shall prove to be an unfounded one it will be a case of mistake or imposition upon the honest judgment of the five members who reported in its favor. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. After what has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYES] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER,] I can only say that the bill met with the unanimous approval of the committee, as I supposed, during the times that I was present at the investigation; and inasmuch as it was not opposed by either gentleman when brought before the House, I believed myself sustained in that opinion.

Sir, the bill passed the Senate after having received the approval of the committee to which it was referred, the whole subject having been particularly examined by Judge HARRIS, as eminent for legal learning as any member of that distinguished body. He told me personally that the matter received at his hands a most thorough scrutiny and careful investigation, and that he came to the conclusion to which the committee agreed, that the claim was just. It commended itself to the favorable consideration of the whole committee, and was passed by the Senate by a large majority. It came to this House and received the careful consideration of your committee.

As to myself, sir, I confess that during a portion of the investigation I was engaged upon the Committee on the Judiciary, and was not able to be present. To a considerable extent I received the statement of the chairman of the committee as to the proofs before the committee, and arrived at the conclusion that the claim was right and just, and authorized the chairman to report me in favor of the passage of the bill.

It does seem to me that it is a reflection upon the House and upon the committee that now, just after the bill has passed, charges of corruption in the claim, or of fraud in its presentation, should be preferred, and more particularly when it has three times received the sanction of the House and twice that of the Senate. To have the measure again committed for examination is a practical denial of justice, or at least an unwarrantable delay in answering the prayer of your petitioners.

The widow and her children have been year after year pressing this claim, and now that it has been settled by the deliberate judgment of Congress I think it unwise and unjust to send it back to a committee for further investigation. I think there should be some credit and faith given to the judgment of men appointed to investigate a case of this character; and unless the House believe the committee has been corrupt the resolution ought not to pass. There should be an end to this matter one way or the other, and inasmuch as I believe the claim to be a just one I certainly am opposed and shall be opposed to the introduction of a resolution which refers it back to the Committee on Private Land Claims or to any other committee of this House.

If it is in order I will now yield a few moments to my friend from Indiana [Mr. KERR] for explanation of the course of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will have to ask the consent of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. PAINE. How long a time does the gentleman desire? I have no objection to his taking ten minutes.

Mr. KERR. I do not wish to occupy more than ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the propriety or impropriety of the adoption of this resolution, nor do I intend to oppose the further investigation of this claim. I have no pride of opinion in the case at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. Is it in order for the gentleman from Indiana to desert this side of the House and go over to the rebels? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. To go over to the rebels would certainly be out of order. [Laughter.] But the Chair understands the point which the gentleman from Wisconsin makes to be that the gentleman from Indiana must speak from his seat or from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw it.

Mr. KERR. I will say to my friend that I am at least in the midst of those who claim to be loyal men. [Laughter.]

As I was saying, I have no pride of opinion in regard to the result of the investigation of our committee. We are liable, it is true, as are all committees in legislative bodies, to be imposed upon or misled. But I desire to say this: that in the investigation of this case by the late Committee on Private Land Claims, we approached the consideration of it with that desire to reach a fair result that should characterize the action of every committee of this House. We had not much time in which to investigate the case. It came to us from the Senate at a late day of the session. It came to us indorsed by the action of the Senate, and particularly by the able report and argument of Judge HARRIS, chairman of the Senate committee.

So far as I am personally concerned, I will say that I examined the case fully, not only in the light of the records placed before me, but also in the light of the opinions of other Congressmen; for I find the reports made heretofore on this same subject, without a single exception I believe, favorable to this claim, not only on the ground of its general fairness and equity, but of its entire justice. Now, I say without hesitation that, in making up my own judgment as a member of the committee, I was controlled a great deal by the opinions of those gentlemen who have hitherto examined the case, and especially by the opinions of the late chairman of the committee in the Senate, knowing him as I do, and as every lawyer on this floor does, to be a jurist of the very highest rank in our country, and to be a gentleman not surpassed in purity of character or uprightness of purpose. The case referred to in 15 Howard does not affect the merits of this claim, but only decides that the court had no jurisdiction to decide the case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. With the gentleman's permission I will say that I intended not the slightest imputation upon the action of the committee. I think their error was in adopting the report made by General Hindman. And I desire to put to the gentleman from Indiana the same question I put to the gentleman from Vermont, namely: where is there any evidence in that report or elsewhere to show that John E. Bouligny was the heir of Bernard d'Auville, who died one hundred years ago; and if there is any such evidence, what is the character of the proof? The gentleman from Vermont could not answer that question, and I now put it to the gentleman from Indiana as a member of the committee.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman from Wisconsin has referred to a report made upon this claim by General Hindman, and has suggested the possibility of an error being made by our committee in adopting that report. Now, I desire to say in this connection, in justice to the committee, that this is the first time in my life that I ever heard of that report. It was never mentioned in my hearing during any investigation by our committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman hear my remark when I stated, that the report, though made by Mr. Hindman, was submitted to the House in his absence by Mr. NOELL, of Missouri?

Mr. KERR. Still my remark is true that the committee knew nothing of that report so far as I am aware.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. They refer constantly to that report made by Mr. NOELL.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] has called for the evidence which was called before our committee. Well, as a lawyer I have only this to say, that I think I could state the evidence in two hours, if it were the pleasure of the House to give me that time in which to do it; but I have not time to do it to-day. The evidence was voluminous and complicated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I would ask the gentleman to state if there was any evidence before the committee that John E. Bouligny was one of the heirs of Bernard d'Auville.

Mr. KERR. I answer that question simply by saying yes; it is the only answer I can make to it. I have not time now to detail the evidence.

Now, a word in reference to another point suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, which was, that the favorable action of the House on the claim of the Bouligny heirs validates the claims of all the other heirs who claim a portion of this land. Let me say in reference to that point, that so far as all the other claimants are concerned, our committee always understood that they were not in such a relation to the Government of the United States that they could ever prefer such claims against the Government; in other words, they were represented as having been engaged in the rebellion, and had thus deprived themselves of any claim they might otherwise set up against the Federal Government.

So far, then, as that part of the case is concerned, I submit that the action of the House in the Bouligny case was a final settlement in regard to this whole matter, and I have nothing further to say upon the subject.

Mr. PAINE. I ought, perhaps, to state to the House why it was that the letter sent to me by my present colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, on this subject was not presented to the House when this bill passed. The reason was this:

his letter charged that the claim was an unjust and illegal one; but it gave no facts upon which I could found my own opinion on the subject. When I received his letter I went at once to the seat of the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, but found that he was out of town. I then showed it to Mr. HORCHISS, of New York, a member of the committee, who examined it and informed me that he did not agree with my colleague as to the merits of the case. I had no knowledge of the facts of the case, and no opinion on the subject, and I therefore put my colleague's letter in my desk, resolved that when the bill came before the House for action I would send it to the Clerk's desk and have it read. But before the bill came up my colleague arrived here, and I saw him often on the floor; and I took his letter to my room and never thought of the matter again until my colleague called the attention of the House to it yesterday.

GOVERNMENT OF REBEL STATES.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. I would state that I have been informed by a major general of the Army that no part of the appropriation made for the support of the Army can be applied for this purpose, and hence the necessity of passing this joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state that this question was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary in reference to the bill which was passed yesterday; and we thought best to leave the question of the necessary appropriation to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOOD. I submit that as this joint resolution contains an appropriation it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

The joint resolution was then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Richard A. Smith.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the cases of Norman Wiard, and Olive Lumphrey.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of William Joslin.

GOVERNMENT OF REBEL STATES—AGAIN.

Mr. WOOD. I understand that it is important that the joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania should pass at once. I therefore withdraw the point of order which would require its consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Then the joint resolution is before the House for its action.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that sufficient money shall be appropriated out of the Treasury to defray the expenses of carrying into full effect in all its parts the act entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, with all acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend by adding "provided the whole amount shall not exceed $300,000."

Mr. BINGHAM. Say $500,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well, I will put it at $500,000. I want to put up the bars somewhere; otherwise millions of dollars may be expended.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MUNGEN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAINE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports.

CLOTHING FOR DESTITUTE SOLDIERS.

Mr. JUDD. The select committee, to whom was referred the bill of the House No. 13, to provide for furnishing clothing to maimed and destitute soldiers, having had the same under consideration, have directed me to report the same back with a substitute, and to recommend the adoption of the substitute.

The substitute was read. The first section authorizes the Secretary of War to furnish annually one complete suit of clothing to each invalid soldier who is the inmate of any regularly constituted Soldiers' Home in the United States out of the stock on hand in the quartermaster's department.

The second section provides that such clothing shall be delivered to the managers of such institutions upon their requisitions therefor, accompanied with such certificates as to numbers and condition as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] if the provisions of this bill will apply to private institutions which support invalid soldiers?

Mr. JUDD. I originally introduced a bill applying simply to the Soldiers' Home in the city which I represent, the city of Chicago. That institution was organized as a private institution, supported by the contributions of the public. During the last session of our General Assembly it was made an incorporated institution. The select committee to whom that bill was referred considered the matter of sufficient importance to justify their asking for the passage of a general law that should apply not only to incorporated institutions where maimed soldiers were supported, but also to private institutions where maimed soldiers were supported.

The substitute was then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JUDD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF BANKRUPT LAWS, ETC.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was, under the law, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Printing when appointed:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five thousand extra copies of the bankrupt and internal revenue acts of the last Congress, to be distributed ratably among those members of the House who are not entitled to receive copies under the resolutions of the last Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House now proceed to business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] yield to me to offer a resolution?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection, if it shall give rise to no debate.

Mr. ROSS. I object; the gentleman can introduce his resolution when the States are regularly called, and then we can all have a chance.

The motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table was then agreed to.

THANKS TO GEORGE PEABODY.

The first business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 1, presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. The first resolution presents the thanks of Congress to George Peabody, of Massachusetts, for his great and peculiar beneficence in giving a large sum of money, amounting to $2,000,000, for the promotion of education in the more destitute portions of the southern and southwestern States, the benefits of which, according to his direction, are to be distributed among the entire population without any distinction except what may be found in needs or opportunities of usefulness.

The second resolution provides that it shall be the duty of the President to cause a gold medal to be struck with suitable devices and inscriptions, which, together with a copy of this joint resolution, shall be presented to Mr. Peabody in the name of the people of the United States.

The third resolution provides that a sufficient sum of money to carry this joint resolution into effect shall be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HARDING. As this is an appropriation bill, I raise the point of order that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The joint resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PRUYN. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. There are two other bills on the Speaker's table, both appropriation bills, and as the same point may be raised upon them, the Chair, if there be no objection, will, before putting the question on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, lay before the House those two bills.

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF FREEDMEN IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution was read at length. It proposes to appropriate $15,000 for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen and Refugees.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this resolution, as it contains an appropriation, must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; and the resolution will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution, which was read at length, proposes to empower and direct the Secretary of War to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want among all classes of the people in those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned widespread destitution; the issues are to be made through the Freedmen's Bureau under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. One million dollars is appropriated for the purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I make the point of order, that as this resolution contains an appropriation it must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope that the motion will not be agreed to. I trust that we shall go through with the call of States and Territories.

Mr. WARD. I move that the House adjourn. I think that the less business we do while we are without committees the better.

RELIEF OF FREEDMEN IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] will, I trust, withdraw that motion for a moment. A few minutes ago I raised a point of order on the joint resolution appropriating $15,000 for the relief of destitute colored people in this District. I have since been informed that great destitution exists among the colored population here, and that an appropriation of this kind is imperatively demanded by considerations of common humanity. I therefore withdraw my point of order. If the Senate has acted on this matter upon sufficient information—and it is to be presumed that such is the fact—the resolution, I suppose, ought to pass.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] withdraws the motion to adjourn; and the gentleman from Indiana having withdrawn his point of order, the joint resolution (S. No. 15) for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia will, if there is no objection, be considered as again before the House.

Mr. PRUYN. I thought that action on my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution of thanks to Mr. Peabody was simply suspended for the purpose of reading the other bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] has renewed the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole; but pending that motion the gentleman from New York moved to adjourn; which motion, as the Chair understands, has been temporarily withdrawn to allow the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to withdraw the point of order which he made.

Mr. PRUYN. It is mortifying to me, as a member of the American Congress, that any objection should be interposed to the passage of the resolution of thanks to Mr. Peabody.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call for the previous question on the joint resolution for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On the motion there were—ayes 37, noes 60.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 61.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—BIRCH VS. VAN HORN.

The SPEAKER presented evidence in the contested-election case of Birch vs. Van Horn, from the sixth district of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

The call of States was then resumed.

GEORGETOWN TEMPERANCE HALL SOCIETY.

Mr. PLANTS introduced a bill to incorporate the Temperance Hall Society of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia when appointed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the select Committee on the Rules be requested to report as an additional rule of the House, one which shall contain substantially the following provisions:

It shall be the duty of every committee to report to the House, as early as practicable, every bill and joint resolution referred to such committee, with the report or recommendation of the committee thereon; and no committee shall fail or neglect to make such report unless it shall be rendered impossible for want of time. But nothing herein shall change the existing rules regulating the order in which committees are called for reports, or enlarge the two morning hours now allowed to committees to report.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY—AGAIN.

Mr. SPALDING. I submit the following joint resolution, and demand the previous question on it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas during the last hours of the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress an act was passed without discussion for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny, granting to said heirs land warrants for seventy-five thousand eight hundred and forty acres of land; and whereas by the solemn decision and judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, after full hearing, it was, in the year 1853, adjudged that the private land claim on which said act is based was invalid, null, and void; and whereas Mr. Justice Nelson, who delivered the opinion of the court, declared that there was no record evidence of any such land grant as was set up, "that none had been produced, though a thorough examination of the archives of that date, both at New Orleans and Paris, had been made, and no records could be found;" and whereas it was also declared by said Judge Nelson, "that there was not the slightest ground for the claim set up" to a tract of land running back from the Mississippi river to the Atchafalaya; and that, at the most, the petitioners could not claim, under any grant or survey, over two thousand five hundred or three thousand acres, instead of about half a million—the report of which decision is found in 15 Howard's Reports, page 14; and whereas said private land claim, after full review by Hon. M. Burchard, Solicitor of the General Land Office in 1838, declared that the same was invalid and void; and whereas said pretended private land claim had its origin in 1717, and was a part of the celebrated Mississippi scheme with which John Law, known for his connection with the South Sea bubble, was a party; and whereas to revive and legalize this claim will revive and legalize claims to the amount of many million acres; and whereas there is good reason for believing that said act was passed under a misapprehension of the facts: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to suspend the execution of said law until the further order of Congress.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was disagreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 65.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Is it in order to discuss this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 27, not voting 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Denison, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketchum, Kitchen, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, McCarthy, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Seefeldt, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Tromp, Ward, Cadwalader C. NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Boyer, Sidney Clarke, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Kerr, Marvin, Moorhead, Morgan, Myers, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Phelps, Poland, Pruyn, Schenck, Selye, Stevens, Van Aiken, Robert T. Van Horn, and Woodbridge—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Banks, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Butler, Calk, Chanler, Elliot, Garfield, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Kountz, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Marshall, McCullough, Mercor, Merrill, Niblack, Pike, Trowbridge, Van Wyck, and Henry D. Washburn—26.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the joint resolution appropriating $1,000,000 for the relief of destitute people in the southern States.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 63, noes 43; and thereupon (at one o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CULLOM: Two petitions of numerous citizens of McLean county, Illinois, asking Congress to prevent the further withdrawal of legal tenders from circulation.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of 300 citizens of North Carolina, praying Congress to establish territorial governments for the districts lately in rebellion.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of Lieutenant H. E. Wentworth, fourteenth New York heavy artillery, praying Congress for relief.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 13, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in obedience to law, a statement of contracts made on account of the medical department of the Army for the year 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented a memorial of R. Johnston and other citizens of Alexandria, Virginia, in relation to the petition of John C. Underwood and others, and in relation to the election held in that city March 5, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Alexandria, and of the election commissioners at the election held there March 5, 1867, with regard to the way and manner in which the election was held; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of H. McKinney, praying payment of a balance alleged to be due on a contract with Captain George B. Hibbard, assistant quartermaster, dated December 24, 1864, for the delivery of ten thousand cords of wood on the banks of the Cumberland river, near Nashville, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Charles C. O'Neil, praying payment of a balance alleged to be due on a contract made with Captain George B. Hibbard, assistant quartermaster, dated December 24, 1864, for the delivery of ten thousand cords of wood on the banks of the Cumberland river, near Nashville, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the memorial of Elizabeth K. Spurrier, guardian and representative of the children of the late Surgeon Henry L. Heiskell, United States Army, praying the passage of an act authorizing the Paymaster General to pay to them the difference of pay, including commutation, which the said Surgeon Heiskell received while acting as Surgeon General of the Army, and that of the pay of Surgeon General, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Abigail Richards, widow of Liberty Richards, late a private in company C, thirteenth regiment New Hampshire volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension, and that she may be allowed an increase of pension for her three minor children; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of Sister Xavier and Sister de Sales, Sisters of Mercy at Charleston, South Carolina, praying for relief. They represent that as trustees they were conducting a charitable institution in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, where one hundred and ten orphan children were being educated; that during the war they maintained and sustained a great many Union soldiers, and bestowed much care upon them. They represent that during the bombardment of Charleston the great body of their buildings were destroyed by the fire from our guns. They represent that the institution was purely charitable, and they ask for aid in rebuilding the buildings which were destroyed. The application is supported by letters from a number of Union officers and soldiers, among others from several who were maintained and cared for by these Sisters during the time they were held as prisoners of war by the rebels. If any case can be presented to induce Congress to grant relief to any claimants who suffered in this way this is one. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think that applications for payment for damages in consequence of the war ought to go to some one committee, which should consider them, and be governed by some principle. If they go to various committees of the Senate we may be involved in difficulty. I suggest, therefore, that this petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that, on consultation with several members of the Committee on Military Affairs, I find it to be the sense of the committee that we shall not take up and consider any one of these private claims, however they may come to us, even though they be referred by the Senate, but that in such cases we shall report them back and have them sent to the Committee on Claims, so as to have a uniform system.

Mr. GRIMES. In this connection I trust that it will be the understanding of the Senate that we shall go back to what used to be the uniform practice of the body from the foundation of the Government until within the last three or four years, of setting aside under our rules—for it is a standing rule of the body, but has not been observed the last three years—each Friday as private bill day, when the matters relating to the private interests of citizens will be transacted, and nothing else. The system that has prevailed during the last session I think it is obvious to everybody is a very bad one; that is, selecting some evening upon which we will transact pension business; another evening on which we will attend to small naval affairs, and another evening upon which we will attend to private claims. Very frequently only those come here at such evening sessions who are interested in a particular class of cases; while if we have them all entered on the Private Calendar, and a day regularly assigned for their consideration, Senators who are interested in particular claims, or who have investigated them, will be here to look after the cases which have been intrusted to their particular consideration and reported back to the Senate. The committee of which I am a member have determined that they will consider no private cases during this Congress, but that if any such cases are referred to them they will report them to the Senate, and have them committed to the Committee on Claims; and I trust that will be the uniform practice of the Senate.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of William J. Blackstone, praying for compensation for services under an appointment of a special agent of the Treasury rendered as Board of Trade for a part of St. Mary's county, Maryland, from January 1, 1863, to April 15, 1865, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the New England Emigrant Aid Company, praying indemnification for the destruction of property at Lawrence, Kansas, May 21, 1856, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of Caleb Lyon be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Ordered, That the Chillicothe band of Shawnee Indians have leave to withdraw their petition presented March 14, 1864.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) to make valid the laws of New Mexico passed at the session of the Legislature, held at Santa Fé from the 3d day of December, 1866, to the 31st of January, 1867, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 13) conferring upon territorial courts jurisdiction under the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, have instructed me to report it back adversely, the committee being of the opinion that the law as passed sufficiently confers jurisdiction upon the courts in the Territories for that purpose. I move the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) for the sale of certain stocks held in trust for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 14) to provide for the payment of the claim of Martha A. Estill, administratrix of the estate of James M. Estill, deceased, Redrick McKee, and Pablo del a Pobra, deceased, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back the joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, for military, naval, and commercial purposes, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to cause surveys, with plans and estimates of cost, to be made by an officer of engineers, for a ship-canal to connect Lakes Erie and Ontario, or the navigable waters thereof, of suitable location and dimensions for military, naval, and commercial purposes, the expense to be defrayed from the sums appropriated in the acts of June 23, 1866, and March 2, 1867, for examinations and surveys relating to the improvement of harbors and rivers on the north-western lakes.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIRECT TAX COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform the Senate how many persons are now in office under the act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts, and for other purposes, approved July 7, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, and what amount of salaries are paid them; also, whether the services of such officers, or some of them, may not be dispensed with without detriment to the public service; and whether any taxes are now being collected through their instrumentality.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 57) in relation to treaties with Indian tribes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 58) to arch Tiber creek north of Pennsylvania avenue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 59) to create the office of surveyor general and establish a land office in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 60) to change the name of the steamer Paonshun; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 27) to authorize the leasing of certain real estate in San Francisco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YATES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 28) to reduce the military reservation at Fort Sanders, Dakota, and Fort Bridger, Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the bill (S. No. 32) to amend and simplify the acts relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, was ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, have instructed me to report the bill back to the Senate with an amendment in the nature of a substitute; and I would ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time. The substitute has been printed and laid upon the tables of Senators so that it can be understood. There is some little verbal alteration in the report of the committee from the printed substitute, which will be understood as it is read. I trust the Senate will consider it at once.

Mr. HOWARD. This bill is one of great importance, and I should be very glad to see it in print.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inform the Senator that it is in print, and has been, or will be, laid on the table of every Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator from Illinois had better let it go over until to-morrow. I want to look at it carefully.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a very important bill, and I want to consider it carefully before I am called upon to vote on it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I doubt whether we can get a vote upon it in a moment, so that there will be time to consider it before we come to a vote. Of course one objection puts it over; but I think it desirable that we should proceed to consider this measure at as early a period of time as possible. The bill is in print, and the committee took some pains to have the amendment which we propose to it printed, and if it has not been laid on the tables of Senators it has been received, and can be laid on the tables of Senators in a moment. I think we shall gain time by proceeding to its consideration now. If, however, any Senator objects, of course we cannot do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill on the day it is reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will call it up after a while, when the morning business has been disposed of, I do not think there will be any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOWARD. I object to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rules.

ARMS TO TENNESSEE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now under the control of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I wish to confer with my colleague on this subject. I think we can agree upon a bill that will be satisfactory to all of us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the joint resolution for consideration.

Mr. FOWLER. I will state to the Senate the facts that induced me to introduce this resolution. Governor Brownlow made a request of the Secretary of War for arms sufficient to arm and equip two thousand or two thousand five hundred militia. I conferred with the Secretary of War on the subject, and he stated to me, after examining the matter carefully, that he did not think he had sufficient authority under the law to furnish the arms to the State of Tennessee. The reasons stated in the preamble to this resolution are the very reasons that Governor Brownlow gave to the Secretary of War for asking for the arms. Believing as I do that the State needs them, and furthermore that she has a right to them, I offered the resolution, hoping that it would meet with no objection. At the same time I do not know that the proposition that my colleague wishes to offer would be objected to by me. I believe it is an amendment that he wishes to add to the resolution.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I think

I can offer an amendment that will be satisfactory to my colleague.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope, though, that the resolution will be taken up immediately. It is not precisely certain how long Congress will be in session, and we do not want the State of Tennessee left without consideration on this subject; at least I wish to know what is to be done in the matter before the Legislature of that State adjourns.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I will agree to take up the resolution in the morning if that will meet the approbation of my colleague. I think he and I can agree upon a measure that will be satisfactory to both of us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion to take up the joint resolution, and declared it not agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON. I call for a division.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee who introduced the resolution [Mr. FOWLER] is willing, at the request of his colleague, that it shall go over until to-morrow. I hope, therefore, we shall not have a division upon it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. On a conference between my colleague and myself, I have no doubt we shall be able to agree upon a measure that will be satisfactory to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska withdraw the call for a division?

Mr. TIPTON. I do.

MONEYS DUE COLORED SOLDIERS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that all checks and Treasury certificates to be issued in the settlement of claims for pay, bounty, prize money, or other moneys due to colored soldiers, sailors, or marines, or their legal representatives now residing, or who may have resided, in any State in which slavery existed in the year 1860, the claim for which has been or may be prosecuted by an agent or attorney, shall be made payable to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, who is to pay the agent or attorney his lawful fees and expenses, and deposit the balance to his own credit, with a list of the names, and post office addresses of the claimants, in the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, or a branch thereof, as established by law, to be paid to the claimants on identification to the satisfaction of the trust company holding such deposit; the trust company to be responsible for the payment to the proper parties, and it is to be the duty of the Commissioner and the officers, and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau to facilitate as far as possible the discovery and identification of the parties for whose benefit such deposit was made.

The Commissioner is to cause a record to be kept of each check and certificate received by him, setting forth the amount, the date of receipt, the amount paid the agent or attorney, the balance deposited, and the date and place of deposit, and the name and post office address of the claimant, and is to transmit a copy of the record to any assistant commissioner or agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, to whom the funds may be remitted for the purpose of deposit; and if necessary for the more prompt settlement of the claims, the Commissioner is authorized to transmit the checks or certificates to any assistant commissioner or agent of the bureau, and to authorize him to pay the fees and expenses to the attorney or agent, and to deposit the balance as provided; and it is to be the duty of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company and its several branches, at the close of each quarter of the fiscal year, to transmit to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau detailed reports of all moneys received, disbursed, and on hand, showing the dates of such receipts and disbursements, and the names and post office addresses of the parties to whom payment has been made, and also the names and post office addresses of the parties to whom the balances unpaid are due. And in case any claimant shall die before receiving the amount due, or shall not be found within two years from the date of deposit of the money, it is to be turned over to the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, to be disposed of as provided by sections ten and eleven of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company," approved March 3, 1865.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does that resolution come from any committee? Has it been referred to a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to make me understand it better than I do now. It seems to me to be pregnant with a great deal of danger.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that there is not a shadow of danger about it in any shape or form to any human being on earth. It will make no expense to the Government. It is simply to save these persons from being, as they are now in many cases, robbed or having enormous charges imposed upon them. This resolution comes here with the recommendation of Mr. French, the Second Auditor, who has been very earnest for some action on the subject all the winter. He states that in some form or other, through mistakes in the mails, losses, or by design, thousands of dollars are taken from these people who are scattered all over the country, and he has held back in some cases until he could find some certain way by which the moneys that have been passed to their credit could get to these persons. I have here a letter from Mr. Brodhead, the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, in which he says: "I most earnestly recommend such action," and he states that early in the winter he assisted in framing a bill on this subject which has never been introduced; I do not know why. The object of this resolution is to prevent this money from being stolen or lost or squandered until it reaches the proper parties to whom the Government proposes to pay it. It puts the money in the care of the Freedmen's Bureau; and it is to be deposited in the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, where it will be safe, and it points out the mode by which it can reach these persons, so that they will receive the money that the Government owes them for their services.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is this company that we propose to make a depository of the public money?

Mr. WILSON. It is a freedmen's bank.

Mr. SHERMAN. A private bank?

Mr. WILSON. It is a bank incorporated by Congress for the freedmen two or three years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. A mere private institution for profit?

Mr. WILSON. For deposits of freedmen. It is an institution gotten up by philanthropic and benevolent gentlemen, men of intelligence and character and means. It is perfectly safe. They will have the means, with the aid of the bureau, of reaching these people and preventing them from being robbed of thousands of dollars. The Government cannot lose a dollar by it. Nobody will lose or can lose anything by it, and these people to whom we vote this money, who are entitled to this money, will probably save tens of thousands of dollars by it. This is all there is about it. Mr. Brodhead, General Howard, and Mr. French are very earnest that this thing shall be done, because they have found in the practical workings of the system, with these people scattered all over the country, that thousands of dollars which the Government pays for their services never get into their hands at all. I believe that under this resolution they will be enabled to receive what is due them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would ask my friend from Massachusetts if the Government would not be liable, provided the money, after it gets into the hands of this private association, is not paid over to the parties entitled to it?

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that I do not suppose there is the shade of a shadow of danger on that subject. The money will be just as safe there as if it were in the Treasury of the United States. The managers of this bank and its branches are receiving deposits all over the country from the freedmen, and they have connections in every part of the country in regard to that matter. They are men who have been laboring with the greatest zeal and earnestness in behalf of the freedmen, for their education, for the saving of their money, and helping them in every way. This institution is perfectly safe. It is now receiving deposits from the freedmen, which are invested in Government securities. These people are scattered up and down the country; some of them troubled in regard to the families who are to receive the money, who their wives are and who their children, as it was once suggested by the Senator from Maryland there would be difficulty in finding out in some cases; and this resolution puts this money into this institution, and then the intelligence and influence and earnestness of the Freedmen's Bureau are to be availed of for the purpose of getting the money into the hands of those who have earned it. Mr. Brodhead has written a letter here; General Howard has written a letter here, and Mr. French has been urging legislation on this subject all the winter for the protection of these people.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that any very great degree of consistency is expected of public men now-a-days. Certainly I do not think we exhibit any very great degree of it. During the session that has just closed we solemnly declared by act of Congress that all the colored men of this country have intelligence enough and position enough and consequence enough in the country to entitle them to the elective franchise. We have made them citizens. We have said nobody shall exercise guardianship over them. And now here comes in a resolution which declares that the Freedmen's Bureau shall take possession of the property of each one of these men; that the Bureau or its agents shall be authorized to receive the drafts that are issued from the Treasury Department to them for their bounty, their pay, or their pensions; and that under certain circumstances the money shall be deposited to the credit of the Commissioner, not in a sub-Treasury of the United States, not in a national bank, but in the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, which, so far as I know, the Senator from Massachusetts knows no more about the solvency of than I do; which has made no exhibit of the condition of its affairs either to the Senate or to Congress, or I think to the Military Committee, and which may be, for aught I know, no more solvent than the bank in the neighborhood of the Senator from Massachusetts, at Newtonville, is to-day, and which I suppose he would have been willing to indorse, as all the citizens of Massachusetts would have been willing to indorse, two weeks ago, in equally as emphatic terms as those in which he has indorsed this savings bank to-day.

Mr. President, the men belonging to the party to which the Senator from Massachusetts and I belong have always claimed that this class legislation was a great error, that it was wrong, that it was wicked; that we should not single out one class and say that the nation should take the guardianship of that class to the exclusion of another class; that we should not single out one class and confer upon them a consequence which we would not confer upon another class. I had thought and hoped that that time had gone by; that we were successful; that we had triumphed in this regard; and that we were to see and hear no more of class legislation. But what is this proposition but placing, by an act of Congress, the business affairs of all the colored men who have been in the Army and Navy and Marine corps of the United States under the guardianship of the Government and of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company?

I have no doubt that wrong has been perpetrated on colored men in the collection of this money. So it has on white men. I think that Mr. Brodhead, if this resolution is to be passed upon his recommendation, and Mr. French could certify in equally as strong terms that there has been swindling by agents of white people as well as black people, and there is no reason in the world why we should pass such a law as this applicable to colored people and not apply it to the white people. I think there would be this advantage to the colored people in this respect: I think there is a great deal in the suggestion thrown out by the Senator from Maryland, that if we require this money to be deposited in this Freedmen's Savings Bank, and that Savings Bank shall become bankrupt in the end, the Government would be compelled to refund the amount of money that was there on deposit to the credit of these colored men, and thus pay it over the second time. There is that advantage in the resolution to the colored men over the white men, but no other advantage, either in principle or in practice.

Mr. WILSON. I concur with the Senator in the principle that we have asserted here, labored to maintain, and have substantially established—the principle of the equality of men under the law of the country and before the law of the country. Now, sir, this resolution does not affect colored men in the States that were free before the war, for the very good reason that everything is there organized, and that while there are cases where soldiers, black and white, there have been cheated by claim agents, which we have endeavored to correct by our legislation, yet as a rule these persons there have an opportunity to find out the best men and to employ them for the collection of their claims, and I suppose nearly all the money goes into their hands. But now how is it as a practical fact in the old slave States? We raised in the State of Kentucky twenty-six or twenty-seven thousand colored men during the war; in the State of Missouri about twenty thousand; several thousand in Virginia and Maryland; some in North Carolina, some in Louisiana, and some in South Carolina. Those people have scattered about; there is nobody to watch for or take care of them; and there are a great many agents who are plundering them and getting all they can out of them. It is safe enough with us to intrust these claims to the mails; but who would think of intrusting to the mails in South Carolina or a large portion of the southern country the money due to these men?

Mr. French tells us that thousands of dollars have been filched from these people, and when they have come here and asked to be paid it has been found that the moneys were paid or lost somewhere and somehow. Mr. Brodhead concurs in the same opinion. General Howard has complaints of this kind from all quarters, and he has been urging me all this winter to have something done with a view that this money paid by the Government shall go into the hands of the men to whom it is due. This plan has been devised after weeks of consultation on the subject. This institution is laboring in every part of this country to gather up the little earnings of the freedmen, to educate them, to enable them to take care of their money and acquire a little property, and it is receiving thousands of deposits from all over the country from these people. Its officers are brought in contact with them, and they have a great opportunity to find out all these people. They are to pay this money over, and of course will do it, as soon as it can be done with safety, to the proper claimants. In this way we secure the aid of all the knowledge and skill and information of the Freedmen's Bureau and of the managers of this bank, who have given time and money and everything they have to the elevation and improvement of the freedmen. This proposition is made for no other purpose on earth than to provide the necessary precaution so that the money paid by the Government shall go into the hands of those to whom the Government intends to pay it. That is all there is in it.

That this institution is a solvent one I of course cannot certify; but I do know that the men who are engaged in it, who came here and asked Congress to incorporate them, who have been laboring in this work, are men of the highest character, and men who are actuated by no other purpose than one of pure benevolence and a desire to aid and elevate and improve the freedmen. I should not be at all afraid to trust liberty, life, anything I have on earth, to those men, as far as I would to any body of men that ever lived. Sir, I believe the passage of this resolution will protect and save a great many of these people from losses. They are now subject to great losses. Disputes arise in regard to the families of colored soldiers, where they have died; and they can be adjusted more easily and better by these people, who want to labor for their good, than by agents who have a direct personal interest to get out of them all they can.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know that I differ much from the Senator from Massachusetts, so far as he has made any statements; but I have one qualification to make to a statement that he has submitted, and that is, that I never saw a body of men since I was born, and I do not expect to see a body of men before I die, that I would be willing to trust my life, my freedom, and my property to.

Mr. WILSON. I said as far as I would to any body of men.

Mr. HOWE. The Freedmen's Trust Company may be as much entitled, as the Senator said, as any other body of men, but there is no body of men who are entitled to it. Mr. President, these moneys which are alluded to in this resolution are due to certain individuals, and your Government never discharges that debt until the money is paid to those individuals. If they have not sense enough to take care of it themselves they ought to put it into some trust company, or to make some men or some body of men their trustee or their guardian for the disposition of this money; and if they have not sense enough to choose a guardian, you, in the work of restoration of reconstruction down there ought to provide some form of government under which the fitness of these individuals to take care of their own money can be tried and determined. You have such tribunals in all your communities. Where a man is a spendthrift, where he is shiftless, where he is worthless, where he is unfitted to be trusted with the care of his own property, there are tribunals authorized to determine that fact and to appoint a guardian for such a person; but you have no tribunal on the face of the earth that ought to be clothed with the authority to take a whole class and doom them to the guardianship of anybody, and especially to doom them to the guardianship of one incorporated company. That is what this resolution proposes to do; nothing short of that. I certainly cannot vote for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The object of this resolution seems to be well enough. It is to secure to the freedmen the moneys due to them by the law. My objection to the resolution is, that it proposes to make as a public depository a corporation over which we have no control, not even the right of visitation. So remarkable a proposition as that I think ought to receive very grave consideration. This company with which it is now proposed to deposit the public money, was incorporated by an act of Congress, which I hold in my hand, passed on the 3d of March, 1865, entitled "An act to incorporate the Freedmen's Saving and Trust Company." It is an ordinary company, with a president, secretary, &c., authorized to receive deposits. It is simply a deposit bank. It is authorized to loan two thirds of its deposits on Government securities, and may loan the other third as the directors see proper. The salaries of the president, secretary, and other officers are fixed by the trustees. Congress have no power or control over it.

The Senator says that the present managers are honorable and honest men. What surety have we that they will continue to be honest and honorable in all time, or that they will not be changed? It is now a mere trust company; and it is proposed to take all the money that is due to all the freedmen of the South, whether they will it or not, and deposit it with this company, place it to the credit of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, payable to his order, and make it the interest of this company to keep it in their hands as long as possible without payment to the freedmen. It seems to me it is a proposition that we ought not to tolerate.

I would have no objection to the passage of a bill that would require this money to be paid through the Freedmen's Bureau or through the disbursing officers of the Army. I see the practical difficulty in reaching the persons entitled to the money, and that agents and attorneys may get hold of the drafts, collect them, and probably not pay over to these colored men who are ignorant of their rights all that is due to them; but if so, they ought to be guarded by disbursing officers of the Army, who are under bonds, who give security. We do not deposit the public money with a national bank without ample security, and certainly we ought not to deposit it with a mere trust company, a mere private association, without ample security. That is the objection I have to the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the resolutions offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] declaring certain further guarantees required in the reconstruction of the rebel States.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that they will lie over informally for a few moments.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no, not informally; let them lie over eternally.

Mr. WILSON. I will not object if they are laid over eternally or any other way. I simply ask that they lie over informally in order that we may finish this joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that these resolutions lie over informally.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood that those resolutions were laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were taken up again, on motion, yesterday.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to their lying over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made the resolutions are before the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire those resolutions to be disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator to allow me to finish this joint resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON. But it is manifest if we go on with these other resolutions they will lead to a debate, and we shall not be able to dispose of this joint resolution or anything else to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to lay them on the table. If any Senator desires to discuss them hereafter we can take them off the table, and I will vote that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to lay on the table the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution No. 21 is before the Senate as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that this is a simple question whether this money shall be paid into the hands of claim agents all over the country, or whether it shall go into the care of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, in order to guaranty its reaching the persons to whom it is due. The bank is simply to be used as a place of deposit, the bank being able to aid in this work. These claims come to the Treasury Department through agents. The law fixes the amount to be received. The money generally is delivered over to the agents; and sometimes it reaches the persons for whom it is intended, and sometimes it does not; it is lost in some way. Now, take the case of a man down in the interior of South Carolina, who was enlisted and served in our armies and is entitled to bounty. He makes a claim on the Government through an agent; the claim is prosecuted by the agent; and then this resolution provides that the money shall not be paid to the agent by the Government, but that the amount of his fees which are fixed by law shall be paid to him, and the rest of the money turned over to the care of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau and deposited in this bank; and then the bureau will ascertain who is the proper person entitled to the money, and will see that the proper individual gets it. It is a simple question of safety so far as the Government is concerned. It is done to aid those for whom the money is intended.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose that in the State of which I am a citizen there are two thousand or three thousand colored men who were citizens of Missouri, Arkansas, or Kentucky in 1860, the time fixed by this resolution; how are they, now living in Iowa, under the provisions of this resolution to get their money?

Mr. WILSON. If they live in Iowa it does not affect them.

Mr. GRIMES. It certainly does, because the language is that all checks or certificates issued for moneys "due to colored soldiers, sailors, or marines, or their legal representatives, now residing, or who may have resided, in any State in which slavery existed in the year 1860" shall be paid over to this bank.

Mr. WILSON. It is intended to apply to cases where the person himself does not apply personally. Where he does he gets the money, of course. I venture to say there never will be a case from Iowa that will go through this bank.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the officers will not administer the law if this be enacted.

Mr. WILSON. The object is to reach persons who live in the southern States, most of whom cannot read and write, and are therefore liable to be imposed upon.

Now, I will say to all those Senators who are making opposition to the passage of this joint resolution that I have no more interest in it than anybody else; but I have been applied to repeatedly during the winter to secure some action on the subject. General Howard, Mr. French, and Mr. Brodhead, who know all about these things practically, are pressing it as a matter of equity, that Congress shall take some action in the premises. I introduced the subject, and it was brought before the Committee on Military Affairs, and reported upon. I should be very glad to have the resolution passed as reported, because I have come to the conclusion, though with a great deal of reluctance, that it is necessary to make this provision for the safety and protection of these people.

Mr. HENDERSON. I really do not know what amount of practical difficulty is experienced upon this subject; but as the representative of some fifteen or twenty thousand negroes who were in the Army from my State I desire to enter my protest against the passage of this resolution. I have never yet heard of any complaint in that State against the agents employed by the negroes in the collection of their claims; and I desire to state, for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts, that he is sadly mistaken in regard to the qualifications of the negroes to look out for their own interests. I would just as lief think of providing that the amount of bounty and back pay due the white soldiers should be deposited in this bank as that due to the black soldiers of my State. I do not know whether they are so sharp in other States in looking out for their interests. It may be that they are much better qualified in my State than elsewhere; but I doubt that. My impression is that the negroes understand their rights as well as anybody; and I protest against the idea that we must be eternally legislating for the negro in order to protect his interest and regarding him as a ward of the Government. All we need do is to confer upon him the rights, civil and political, that we confer upon other men, and then I guaranty that the negro will take care of himself; and so far as his money rights are concerned he will look out for them with the same diligence and the same care that white men do.

As was properly said by the Senator from Ohio, we organized a few years ago a company to do a banking business, and now the proposition is made that there be a forced deposit in that bank of all the moneys due by the Government to the negroes of the entire country. I should like to know from the Senator from Massachusetts whether that bank has been organized at all or not.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly it has been organized, and it has a large amount of money on hand.

Mr. HENDERSON. Where is it organized?

Mr. WILSON. Here in this city, and it has two or three branches. It has several hundred thousand dollars of money on deposit.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know where these branches are. The bank, the Senator tells me, is organized in the District of Columbia. There is no branch of it in my State that I know of; and so far as honesty and fidelity are concerned, I would as soon trust the agents in the State of Missouri to deliver over the money to the freedmen as to trust the officers of this bank, however high they may be in public estimation. I have no doubt of the integrity of the corporators of that institution; but at the same time I have as little doubt of the integrity of the gentlemen who are engaged in procuring back pay and bounty for the soldiers, white and black, in my State; and I protest against forcing the freedmen's money into this bank as a deposit and then compelling the freedmen to prove their identity to the officers of the bank before they can obtain their money. That identity is already proved before the agent. And let me assure the Senator that it is not so easy for agents in any section of the country to defraud negroes or white men. They expect, as other men, to live; they expect to live by their labor, by their profession. It is known not only by the individual who intrusts business to them, but generally by his neighbors and friends, and frequently by the entire community, that that particular case is intrusted to him; and in order to secure fidelity and strict and honest dealing, my opinion is that we had better leave this business where it is.

Mr. DIXON. I should be obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts if he would explain more fully one remark which he made, which I perhaps misunderstood. I understood him to say that it was well known that it was not safe to send money through the mails in the southern States to the persons mentioned in this joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON. What I meant to say was this: everybody knows that the mails in the South have been exceedingly irregular, and a great many letters have been lost. I have had occasion to send to and receive from that section of the country small sums of money, and I should never think of putting them in the mail as I would in case they were to go to New York or Boston. I do not mean that it is because there is not proper effort to secure regularity there. I know the mails are improving in that respect in that section of country. Then there is another thing to be considered, that these people who cannot read and write are easily imposed upon.

Mr. HOWE. I want to add another thing to what I have already said. If it were proposed here that this money should be paid by the Government simply to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to be by him paid to the claimants, I should not have any objection; and if it went further than that, and authorized the Commissioner to expend for the use of the freedman himself such portions of the money as were due to those freedmen who are drawing supplies, rations, or support in any way from the Government, I should not have any objection to it. But it goes much further than that. It does not direct the Commissioner to pay this money to any of the claimants; it prohibits him in terms from paying it to any of the claimants, and directs him to deposit the money in the vaults of an incorporated company, thus keeping it from the hands and the possession of those who are really entitled to it by law. It is that that I cannot consent to; and it does not discriminate at all between those who do draw their support from the Government and those who do not, between those who are educated and those who are not.

Now, I understand something of the information which I suppose is in possession of the Senator from Massachusetts. I understand something of the cases which I suppose the Second Auditor had in his mind when he made this complaint of the difficulty of getting these moneys into the hands of the true owners. I understand that there was a regiment, or something like that, of colored soldiers mustered out in New Orleans, and that a claim agent from Washington went down there, represented himself to be an agent of the Government, had a messenger dressed up in uniform to aid him, obtained the discharges of a large number of those soldiers, brought them up here; and it is said that claims were made out in the city of New York on all those discharges, transmitted here, and paid by an officer of the pay department, and paid over to this agent. Many of the soldiers of that regiment from whose hands these certificates were kept were educated men. I have seen the letters of one of them, and he writes a much better hand than the Senator from Massachusetts or myself either, and not only writes a good hand, but composes well, is evidently an educated man. Education is no guard, no protection against such operations as that. It was not because they were ignorant that they were defrauded. Education does not protect them against that. This joint resolution would not. It might possibly protect them against such a swindle as that, but it would perpetrate upon them another injustice just as great. If the man who owns the money cannot have it, he would just as lief a claim agent should have it as this Freedmen's Trust Company. What difference does it make to me who has my money if I cannot have it myself?

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that this money is all to be paid over to General Howard, the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. GRIMES. He is obliged to pay it over to this bank.

Mr. WILSON. He has to deposit it in this bank; but he has the whole machinery of his bureau to find out who are the proper parties who are entitled to it. He is authorized to send the money to the agents and assistant commissioners of the bureau in different parts of the country to be paid there to those who are entitled to it. The object is to facilitate these settlements; to pay the money promptly, and pay it surely.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that it be recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to—ayes eighteen, noes not counted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 19) to clothe the maimed and destitute soldiers;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 7) providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States;" and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny.

TREASURY PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a special committee of three members be appointed by the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to examine into the conduct and management of the Printing Bureau of the Treasury Department with a view of determining whether the same may be dispensed with entirely, or, if continued, whether its expenses can be lessened, and what additional safeguards, if any, are needed to prevent frauds or mistakes in the printing and canceling of notes and other public securities of the United States. And said committee shall further examine and make report to the Senate at its next session showing:

1. The amount of all Treasury notes, United States notes, compound-interest notes, fractional currency, and bonds and other public securities of every kind and description, which have been printed by said bureau since its organization and delivered for use to the Treasury Department.

2. The denomination, date, number, letter, or other particular descriptions of each of said notes and securities signed and issued or negotiated by the Treasury Department, and the title and date of the act of Congress under which the issue was authorized.

3. The number and amount of such notes and securities that have been canceled or destroyed by the Department, the date and cause of cancellation, and particular description of the note or bond so canceled, and whether upon such cancellation other issues have been made to supply the place of those destroyed, and if so, a minute description of the notes and bonds so prepared and issued.

4. The amount of such notes and public securities now outstanding, with a description of each as the same may be ascertained from a thorough inspection of the registry books and accounts kept in the different bureaus of the Treasury Department, and if necessary by an examination of the officers, clerks, and employees of said Department; and said committee may in their discretion employ a clerk to keep a record of said examinations, and assist in the preparation of their report.

DUTIES ON HAWAIIAN VESSELS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred House joint resolution No. 2, to authorize the refunding of discriminating duties exacted upon merchandise imported in Hawaiian vessels, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage, and I should like to have it considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or refund all duties which have been assessed since the 1st day of January, 1865, on Hawaiian vessels and their cargoes beyond the amount which would have been payable on vessels of the United States and their cargoes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that by the operation of a proclamation of the President, dated January 29, 1867, Hawaiian vessels were relieved from the effect of all laws imposing a discriminating duty upon their tonnage or their cargoes since December 10, 1866, the date at which the State Department was officially notified that no discriminating duties were exacted by the Hawaiian Government from United States vessels. It appears, however, that the Hawaiian Government has never discriminated against the vessels of the United States, but previous to the 10th of December, 1866, discriminating duties were exacted in several instances from Hawaiian vessels and their cargoes in ports of the United States, because the facts as to the action of the Hawaiian Government had not been officially brought to the notice of the President, and recognized by him. Application is now made to return the discriminating duties thus exacted; and this joint resolution proceeds upon the ground that through a mistake of the Treasury Department these discriminating duties were exacted from Hawaiian vessels in the ports of the United States, on the supposition that similar duties were exacted by the Hawaiian Government from vessels of the United States; but it appears that such was never the case and hence the application to refund these duties. This is in accordance with a precedent that was established in 1828 as to Prussian vessels.

I am advised that the amount is inconsiderable. There are two claims now presented to the Treasury Department amounting to some seven thousand dollars; and I understand that there is another one of small amount that will probably be presented, so that I do not think the whole amount will exceed $10,000.

This joint resolution has been passed by the House of Representatives at the present session, and considered by the Committee on Finance. That committee are fully satisfied that it ought to pass, and its passage is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is to carry out a treaty, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF A VESSEL'S NAME.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 60) to change the name of the steamboat Paroshun, have directed me to report it back, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration. It simply proposes to allow the name of this vessel to be changed to Nevada.

The bill was, by unanimous consent, considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 19) to clothe the maimed and destitute soldiers was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 7) providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose that resolution ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations; it is for the appropriation of money.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Committee on Appropriations may as well commence right on these matters. According to the rule, all general appropriation bills go to the Committee on Appropriations; but special appropriations ought to be considered by the appropriate committee. I think this is a proper subject for either the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that that be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the second reading of the joint resolution to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only have one reading to-day unless by unanymous consent. The joint resolution will lie over under the rules.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed, on the 12th instant, the following bill and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 31) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate a National Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States,'" approved March 21, 1866;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) supplementary to other joint resolutions to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) extending the time for the completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after nearly four hours spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 13, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by Rev. JOSEPH T. COOPER, D. D., of Philadelphia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, the papers in the case of A. Grant were withdrawn from the files of the House.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, in regard to the equalization of bounties; which were ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, when appointed, and printed.

MEMORIALS FROM NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorials from the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico: Memorial asking for increase of pay and salaries of members of the Legislature and civil officers of the Territory—ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Territories, when appointed, and printed.

Memorial in relation to the school lands of that Territory—ordered to be referred to the same committee, and printed.

Memorial in relation to Indian depredations in that Territory—ordered to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, when appointed, and printed.

Memorial in relation to the establishment of telegraphs between the military posts from Kansas to New Mexico—ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, when appointed, and printed.

Memorial in relation to the erection of a penitentiary in that Territory—ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Territories, when appointed, and printed.

Memorial asking for the completion of the Capitol building at Santa Fé—ordered to be referred to the same committee, and printed.

Memorial in regard to property destroyed by the rebels in that Territory—ordered to be referred to the same committee, and printed.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1869, a statement of contracts made on account of the medical department of the Army for the year 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COOK asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. HARDING, for the balance of the session.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER stated as the regular order the calling of the committees for reports. The committees were called, but no reports were made. The Speaker accordingly announced that the morning hour had expired.

TARIFF ON UMBRELLAS AND PARASOLS.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, and before offering it I beg leave to state that it is intended to remedy a defect of the present tariff. The duties as imposed by the present tariff upon silk are sixty per cent. ad valorem, on umbrellas and parasols thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. By the recent tariff on wool the duties on alpaca and other articles of which the better class of umbrellas are made are increased so that the business of manufacturing umbrellas and parasols for females will be almost destroyed. The resolution which I desire to offer contemplates putting the duties on these articles at the same rate which the raw material pays.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for information, after which the Chair will entertain any objection which may be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

*Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That after the passage of this joint resolution there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon umbrellas, parasols, and sunshades imported from foreign countries, when made from silk, no lower rate of duty than that now imposed upon piece and dress silks, namely, sixty per cent. ad valorem, and when made of other materials than silk the duty shall be fifty per cent. ad valorem.*

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the object to refer this joint resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. KELLEY. The Committee of Ways and Means has not yet been appointed. This resolution is designed to remedy—

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless the resolution is to be referred, I object to its introduction.

Mr. KELLEY. If the committee were appointed I would gladly have the resolution referred.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object.

TEXAS CATTLE DISEASE.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture, when appointed, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the nature, causes, and results of what is commonly known as Spanish fever or Texas cattle disease, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object. It seems to me unnecessary to provide for the reference of subjects to committees when appointed. We had better appoint the committees, or else refer no business to them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object. There will be an opportunity to offer all these resolutions when the States shall be called.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES—AGAIN.

Mr. McCLURG. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering a joint resolution which on Monday last was referred to the Committee of the Whole, in regard to paying bounties to certain troops in Missouri and placing them on an equal footing with other volunteers.

The SPEAKER. If the House goes into the Committee of the Whole, business will have to be taken up in its regular order and disposed of or laid aside until that resolution is reached.

Mr. McCLURG. I have no objection to that.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of a joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) to place certain troops on an equal footing with others in regard to bounties.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the troops recognized in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for completing the defenses of Washington, and for other purposes, approved February 13, 1862," shall be considered as placed on an equal footing with other volunteers as to bounties; and all laws relating to bounties are to be made applicable to them as to other volunteers.

Mr. McCLURG. Mr. Chairman, I hope and believe very few minutes, not to exceed ten, will suffice to explain the object of this joint resolution. Beyond a sufficiency I have no desire to speak. I believe all who are here from the Thirty-Ninth Congress will bear me witness that I have shown no disposition to consume unnecessarily the valuable time of the House or committee. I can therefore confidently expect that gentlemen will give attention while I shall very briefly give the points in the case embraced by the resolution. It is intended to secure equal justice, and nothing more, to as brave and meritorious an organization of volunteers as did service for the United States Government during the late rebellion. The organization of which I speak, and which is referred to in the resolution, is that, so far as Missouri is concerned, of a volunteer force which is recognized in the act referred to, approved February 13, 1862, the third section of which act is as follows:

"That no volunteers or militia from any State or Territory shall be mustered into the service of the United States on any terms or conditions confining their service to the limits of said State or Territory, or their vicinities, beyond the number of ten thousand in the State of Missouri and four thousand five hundred in the State of Maryland, heretofore authorized by the President of the United States or Secretary of War, to be raised in said States."

These troops are here recognized as having been raised by authority from the President of the United States or Secretary of War, and mustered into the service of the United States. This force was organized, was mustered into the service of the United States, served faithfully and valiantly, of which there is abundant evidence, with other volunteer troops from other States, under command of United States officers, during the war, as they were mustered in for three years or during the war.

The question then naturally arises, whence the necessity for this resolution or any legislation on the subject? The necessity arises from what may be inferred from the reading of the act referred to, that these troops were mustered into the United States service on condition, confining their service to the limits of the State. This condition caused doubt in the mind of the Solicitor for the War Department whether these men were entitled to bounties as other volunteers in the absence of a special law; while it is not and will not be denied that almost all, if not all, these troops were ordered from the State, obeyed the orders cheerfully, and rendered service out of the State. We can produce the certificates of various officers to these facts, and the reports in the War Department in this city show that these troops did service, not only in Missouri, but in Arkansas, in Kansas, on the plains, and in New Mexico.

As to their bravery and efficiency I might speak and pass a just eulogy upon the brave men who composed this organization and the gallant officers, one of whom is my colleague, who sits immediately before me, who served from 1861 until after the close of the war, [Mr. GRAVELY.] But it is considered a breach of politeness to talk about present company, and I have also promised to be brief.

Did time permit, there is present a major general [Mr. DODGE] who commanded the department of Missouri, whose ability and noble bearing have been recognized by the people of the State of Iowa in sending him here to represent one of her districts, who could testify to the activity, bravery, and efficiency of these troops.

But, Mr. Chairman, I believe about enough has been said. This subject was referred to the Military Committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. That committee believed these troops were embraced in the new bounty bill which passed the House at its last session, as the bill came from the committee, but, to gratify the Missourians by removing all doubts, made no objections to an amendment embodying what is contemplated by this resolution. That bounty bill has failed as yet to become a law. We desire this resolution to pass, in order that existing laws as to bounties may be applicable to these troops as to other volunteers. The committee will see that we are asking but equal justice, and for those who did as much, even when doing battle in Missouri, as though they had been in Virginia or in Louisiana; for they were a part of the grand army of volunteers that fought for and, by the help of God, saved this nation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there be no opposition, I will ask that the committee report the resolution to the House. If any gentleman desires to ask a question, I will take pleasure in endeavoring to answer it to his satisfaction.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by inserting after "1862" the words "also those borne on the rolls as slaves."

Mr. Chairman, I will say in explanation of this amendment that, according to the ruling of the Second Auditor's office, all colored troops enlisted in the service of the United States, if at the time of their enlistment they appear on the rolls as slaves, are excluded from any participation in the bounties which have been provided for by our laws. They have therefore received no part either of the original bounties or of the additional bounties. It is for the purpose of securing to these colored soldiers the benefit of our bounty laws that I have offered this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McClurg] whether this bill has ever been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House?

Mr. McCLURG. This question was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the last Congress. That committee, as I have already stated, approved of the measure, and embodied it as they believed in the bounty bill, which has twice passed this House, but has never yet become a law.

The bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported to the House.

THANKS TO GEORGE PEABODY.

The next business in order upon the Calendar was Senate joint resolution No. 1, presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody.

The joint resolution was read at length. The first resolution presents the thanks of Congress to George Peabody, of Massachusetts, for his great and peculiar beneficence in giving a large sum of money, amounting to $2,000,000, for the promotion of education in the more destitute portions of the southern and southwestern States, the benefits of which, according to his direction, are to be distributed among the entire population without any distinction except what may be found in needs or opportunities of usefulness.

The second resolution provides that it shall be the duty of the President to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable devices and inscriptions, which, together with a copy of this joint resolution, shall be presented to Mr. Peabody in the name of the people of the United States.

The third resolution provides that a sufficient sum of money to carry this joint resolution into effect shall be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope this joint resolution will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. UPSON. I see that the appropriation is unlimited. I would like to have some idea of the amount that may be needed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. It is merely to pay for a gold medal; it cannot be a large amount.

Mr. UPSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARDING. I move to amend this joint resolution by striking out the provision relating to a gold medal, and I trust this committee will see the propriety of amending this joint resolution at least to that extent. I am as much in favor of the education of the people of the United States as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] can be. I feel as gratefully toward the benevolent gentleman named in this joint resolution, as I trust I ought to feel. But I do not believe a person who makes a donation which should command the national gratitude would feel much gratified at receiving a gold medal therefor.

It may be that this was a great sacrifice for a man whose wealth is hundreds of millions of dollars; and it may be that in the opinion of many gentlemen here he is entitled to a gold medal. But if I were called upon to select worthy objects for gold medals, I would select those men who gave more than a fortieth part of their wealth for their country. I would select those brave men who gave not only all their property, but also their lives for our country. I would give medals to men who gave evidence during the recent dark period of our history of a fervent love for our institutions. I do not know what claim Mr. Peabody may have upon the loyal millions in this land for a gold medal. If I am correctly informed he made a profit out of the rebellion which he aided and abetted. If I am wrongly informed I wish to be corrected. But I shall not vote a gold medal to a man who, from the information I have received, I believe was, while all the time an American citizen, conspiring against the integrity of this nation.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. HARDING, and being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment being offered,

The joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH.

The next business upon the Calendar was Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

The resolution, which was read at length, proposes to empower and direct the Secretary of War to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want among all classes of the people in those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned widespread destitution; the issues are to be made through the Freedmen's Bureau, under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. One million dollars is appropriated for the purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. WOOD. I suppose the Committee of the Whole will recommend the passage of this joint resolution; but it will not be with my vote. I am opposed to the Government of the United States distributing alms under any circumstances whatever, and in any direction whatever. That is my first objection to this joint resolution.

I am also opposed to it upon another ground. In a recent visit which I made to the southern States, since the 1st of January, during which I made it my duty to observe the condition of the southern people in a very large portion of the Atlantic southern States, I saw no such destitution as has been described. I saw no class of the people, certainly not of the white portion of the population of those States, who would make any application to Congress for alms, or who would acknowledge themselves paupers and dependents upon the General Government for aid and support; or who needed anything more from the North than protection for their civil rights, and northern capital to develop their industry and to enable them to grow their crops.

I will admit that the people of the South do require pecuniary assistance, but they do not require it as a charity. They require it for the purpose of enabling them to grow those great staples that are so valuable to the country; they require northern capital to endeavor to resuscitate their impoverished plantations; they require at our hands, or at the hands of some department of the Government, some disposition of the status of their labor; they require their labor system disposed of so that capitalists and other employers can depend upon some labor by which they can develop these important crops.

Therefore I am opposed to this measure for these reasons: first, that I am opposed, on general principles, to the Government giving public money for charitable institutions; and secondly, because, in my judgment, and, as the result of personal observation made within the last sixty days in the southern States, I do not believe that any considerable portion of the people there require alms.

They have, sir, a pauper population, as every northern county and city has, but none of the northern States have applied to Congress for aid, nor has the South, through any existing State government or any competent officer, authorized to speak for any one county, city, town, or village in the southern or southwestern States, applied to the Government for the distribution of alms.

For these reasons, sir, I shall vote against the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I regret to take up any of the time of the House in opposing this resolution; but I would inquire if there is to be any limit to these appropriations asked for from this Congress? Is it true that this Government is a mine of inexhaustible wealth, and that it has become a hospital for the destitute of the entire country? Is it true that millions and millions are to be voted out of the public Treasury to be used to feed the wives and children of those men who raised the arm of rebellion against the flag of our country? If Congress shall adopt a policy to make appropriations for the destitute of the land, let them go into the large cities, into the towns and hamlets, and provide for the widows and children of our soldiers, and lavish upon them the bounty they propose to give.

I know when a measure comes with the support of General Howard it is hard to oppose it. Sir, I love his patriotic devotion to his country, and his devotion to the suffering everywhere. I know that when he comes before Congress asking an appropriation for the suffering millions it is hard to resist it; but let me say here that this bill calling for an appropriation of $1,000,000 is not all that we shall be called upon to vote. Is there any point where we can stop these vast calls upon our Treasury? If there be not, I say the time will soon come when you will want another bankruptcy law—one for the Government, and not for the citizen.

This appropriation is to be paid out by the Freedmen's Bureau. I undertake to say that there have been sufficient appropriations made at the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress for that bureau. There was, I understand, a surplus of $280,000 remaining.

During the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress we appropriated $5,136,000 more for the destitute of the South. Yet now we are asked to draw $1,000,000 more from the pockets of the toiling yeomen of our country to feed the rebels of the South.

Mr. Chairman, I here enter my solemn protest in the Hall of this House against an appropriation which shall tax the one-armed and limbless soldiers of the Republic who fought and suffered for the flag, to take this money out of their pocket and pay it to the women and children of rebels, women and children who with malignant hatred spat upon our soldiers wounded and weary in their march to the sea. I protest against it in behalf of the widows and orphans of the men who were starved to death at Andersonville.

Why should we appropriate $1,000,000 for feeding the poor of that region? Is there no law by which we could make the wealthy rebels support their own poor and destitute? I think if my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had control of that department he would find some law by which the wealthy rebels should be taxed to feed their own poor.

I am opposed to this measure; I oppose it because this Congress must come to a stop some time in these appropriations of millions from the pockets of our people, who are now oppressed with taxation. And I understand some of these southern communities spurn the offering of help by Mr. Peabody. I say then let them wait. If there is to be suffering in this country, if there is to be destitution, if any are to suffer, let it be the disloyal; and if need be, let God Almighty populate that country with people who will love our flag and the free institutions of which it is the emblem.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in advocacy of the pending bill. I am in favor of it as a great measure of reconstruction. I believe it will do more to allay the feelings which now exist in the South toward the people of the North than any other measure we could adopt. I believe it will reach into regions where no other agency could penetrate. I believe it will go into parts of the South where now there are no newspapers, where public education is almost unknown, and will address itself directly to the hearts of the people, and be evidence to them that the people of the North are not, as they have been taught to believe, their bitter, relentless foes; that we really do not desire their impoverishment and degradation. It will be not only an answer to these arguments used by the demagogues of the South with which they led the masses into rebellion, but an answer also to the doctrines preached at the North by those who were opposed to the war.

I do not wonder, Mr. Chairman, that there is opposition to this measure on the other side of this Chamber. I believe it will have a most potent and beneficent effect upon the minds of the people of the South; and the donation of this great charity will go as an answer to all the charges and declarations made against us, so that it will be made manifest, even to the humblest and poorest of the South, that we of the North have waged this great war for their advancement and elevation in the scale of humanity; not for their injury and degradation.

We are told that this bill should not be passed, because there is poverty in the North. Why, sir, the North during the war and ever since has overflowed with prosperity. If there is poverty here, there is also wealth here to relieve it. There is no outcry in our midst rising up to Heaven from the face of a stricken and desolated land. It is our part from our abundance to help this people and to lift them up. It will be, I repeat, the strongest of all answers to the arguments made against us.

Nay more, sir, it will go abroad among the nations of the earth that this American Republic has attained a loftier standard than that of any nation known to history—that we not only have not visited with severity, wrath, and punishment the men who waged for four long years a fierce rebellion to destroy us, but that roused by the cries of suffering humanity we have absolutely extended the hand of relief to the enemies of the nation.

The whole amount asked for, large as it may appear, is but a slight contribution when divided among the millions of the people of the North; according to my estimate it would be but a few cents to each individual of our population. I do not believe there is a man in the North who, in the presence of the poverty and destitution and suffering which undoubtedly exist in the South, would refuse to contribute his mite toward saving them from death. Nay, I believe that even the one-armed and one-legged soldiers, to whom allusion has been made, who fought to put down this rebellion, and received their wounds at the hands of the rebels, would contribute from their poverty toward the relief of the starving women and little children of the South. They fought with men in the open field; they will not carry their hatred against helpless infancy, old age, and womanhood, struggling in the grasp of starvation.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will pass. I would be glad to see it meet the unanimous approval of this House, so that this act might bear witness to all the world that we have waged the great war through which we have passed to build up and not to destroy; to advance and benefit the people of the South, not to oppress and injure them.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, many reasons may be suggested why we should not pass this resolution, and I think I have considered them all. Yet I hope the resolution will be adopted. We may point to the fact which the eloquent gentleman before me [Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana,] did of the reported refusal, not as he said of the so-called States of the South, of the munificent donation of Mr. Peabody. What he alluded to was merely the ravings of prominent leaders, editors, and speakers, who insanely clamor against its acceptance. The masses of the southern people have not responded to these absurd suggestions. We may also point to the fact that Mississippi is said to have appropriated no less a sum than $20,000 for the defense of Jefferson Davis. And we may point to the fact that the North is filled with widows and orphans, the wives and children of men slowly starved to death or poisoned by the malaria of the fatally located military prisons to which they were consigned. And we may point to the fact, though we cannot charge it to others, that in all the large centers of our industry our laboring people are unemployed and expending the little sums they have garnered or living upon public charity, and as we do so ask, why not appropriate the sum named to these? Giving full weight to these suggestions, I hope this resolution, as adopted by the Senate, will pass.

The mountaineers of Alabama, Georgia, and central South Carolina, the poor whites of that broad section of country in which there was a failure of crops last year, have been as much oppressed and almost as deeply wronged as the slaves of olden times, and they will be the recipients of this charity. The majority of them are old men, and women and children. Let us, who wisely say to these people that they can enjoy no political rights until they can do so with safety to themselves and the Union, and who hold them with an iron hand until they shall fashion institutions that will save themselves and whosoever may dwell among them from such oppression in the future, see to it that they do not want for the common necessities of life.

The resolution proposes to appropriate money for the temporary relief of such—the blind, the dumb, the driven masses of the South, whose sufferings were entailed upon them by their oligarchic leaders as much as were the sufferings in the North to which I have faintly alluded, caused by those same leaders who plunged the country in war. Let us show them that we have the sympathies of fellow-citizens, and that while we have the resources of a great nation at our command we will not consign to hunger and starvation the people, men, women, and children, of large districts of our common country.

I apprehend that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] in the recent visit to the South of which he spoke, went to the commercial centers and rich low lands, and associated with the still wealthy old master class of that region who, like himself, are strict constructionists of the Constitution, and who never cared whether a poor free white neighbor died or lived so that the enslaved negro was a thing of value to them. He did not visit inhospitable mountain regions where want and hunger sit by every hearthside and where death is busy. It is for the people of such sections that this appropriation is contemplated. The resolution names $1,000,000, the expenditure of which is to be made by the chief of the Freedmen's Bureau, under the orders of the Secretary of War; but it does not direct the disbursement of the whole amount, and there is, I am sure, no gentleman on this side of the House who will not trust the discretion and fidelity of Gen. Howard and Secretary Stanton in a matter of this sort. Let us then make this appropriation and say to the poor people of the South, "While we will restrain those who through life have wronged and oppressed you, and finally made you wage war against us, you shall not suffer while it is in our power to give you relief."

Mr. BANKS. I propose the following amendment.

Provided, That there shall be expended from the appropriation herein named, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, the sum of $50,000, for the purchase of seeds to be distributed among the destitute people of the South by the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "provided" and insert the following:

That $75,000 thereof be appropriated to supply, through the Agricultural Department, seeds for the Freedmen's Bureau to distribute to the inhabitants of said States to enable them to raise provisions for their own support.

While I am in favor of the resolution making appropriations to relieve the suffering and starving people of the South, I think we ought to be guarded in making so large an appropriation as this. We appropriated at the last Congress large sums; $7,000,000 to support the poor of the South, besides $25,000 to those in Washington city and recently fifteen thousand dollars more. We are now called upon to appropriate again $1,000,000 in order to support the so-called poor people of the South.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that these people ought to be encouraged by giving them seeds and let them cultivate the soil. They have a productive country, and if they will but cultivate the soil as they ought to do they will have ample provision for their own support, and if we are to be called upon year after year to provide for their wants, without any effort being made upon their part to support themselves, where is the matter to stop? It may continue to run to millions of expenditure for their support. They have their lands from which, with proper exertion, they certainly can raise sufficient for their support, besides a surplus; and now, instead of appropriating the whole of the $1,000,000 as indicated by the joint resolution, I propose that a portion of that sum be devoted to the purchase of seed, to be obtained through the Agricultural Department, and distributed by those in charge of the Freedmen's Bureau. This will enable them with proper industry to provide themselves with food, and put a stop to this drain upon the United States Treasury. I am told by the honorable Commissioner of Agriculture that the demand in the late rebel States for seeds of various kind is so great that it is out of his power to supply them without such an appropriation. I agree with the honorable gentlemen that have preceded me that these men were led into the rebellion by their leaders, and induced by them to raise their arms against the flag of their country, and we ought not to let them starve, but at the same time we ought to teach them that they must use industry and be vigilant to acquire support, and not depend upon the charity of a Government that some of them, at least, attempted to destroy; and by a proper attention to agricultural pursuits their fertile soil will yield abundance. They must, like the northern people, make labor respectable, and give up their favorite notions of oligarchy, now exploded by the abolition of slavery.

I am willing to appropriate any money absolutely necessary for this purpose, but not in favor of appropriating any money to keep them in idleness and in neglect of their own opportunities to gain a livelihood. Let them go to work, cultivate their soil, and in another year they will have sufficient to support themselves.

I have, Mr. Chairman, the utmost confidence in General Howard and our much-esteemed Secretary of War. I am satisfied that so far as they are concerned the money placed in their hands will be faithfully and impartially distributed; but it seems to me that $75,000, or even $100,000, of the sum named in the joint resolution would be of more advantage to those people by furnishing that amount in proper seeds to enable them to turn their attention to raising the necessities of life. I therefore trust that the amendment I proposed may be adopted by this House.

Mr. CHANLER. I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has already been before the House, and that an order has been issued, so far as a legislative body could issue it, to the Secretary of War to furnish seeds, and I believe that if the exigencies of the case admitted it the Secretary of War would distribute seeds to satisfy the demands of the South.

This whole measure is, in my opinion, defective in its spirit and weak in the manner in which it professes to meet the object designed. There are in the South millions upon millions of human beings, millions of whom are under the immediate supervision of the Freedmen's Bureau. There are others who, by a distinction drawn by the majority on this floor, owing to their color, are excluded from the opportunity of accepting any part of the munificent donation which the Government makes.

Now, the gentleman who proposed this bill can hardly think that this niggard charity of $1,000,000 will meet the requirements of the black race of the South.

Sir, this munificent appropriation would amount to nothing. It is not intended to meet the interests of any of the individual residents of the South except the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau. It is designed to assist these people to carry on the bureau, and not to reach the suffering millions who are under the control of that bureau. It is a black sheep in dirty wolf's clothing. The bill is brought to the consideration of the House; it is offered in the name of charity.

Do not insult our better nature by beginning with this profession of doing good when the design is merely and actually to keep up a political machine, and that is the truth about it. We do not require new attacks upon the South; we do not require the bitter and malignant feelings that have been poured out by gentlemen here with regard to the South, to work on the enthusiasm of the majority here to vote this money. It is not to clothe the poor; it is not that the blind may see, and the lame may walk, but that the political machinery of the Freedmen's Bureau may go limping through the land sustained by the patronage of the Government. Charity! For what? To keep up the malignant passions which this war has engendered, to keep up the demarkations which hatred has established, but not to soothe the suffering or give amelioration or relief to the conquered and those who are really in destitution in the South.

So far as the motives which actuate this measure are pure and good, I welcome it. I know from personal observation during the past two years, extended over the Atlantic coast down to the extreme points of Florida, that suffering in the South does exist. I know from correspondence direct from the South within a few days past, that in the interior of the State of South Carolina the people are starving for food. I believe that some such measure as this is called for by the necessities of the southern people. But how ridiculous and how absurd it is to speak of extending the hand of charity by offering this pittance.

It is but an opportunity to allow the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to reiterate his often-uttered anathemas against a class of men whom he personally dislikes; and to allow other gentlemen to make their maiden speeches, and prove to their constituencies that the slime and venom of their local party organizations have not been washed from them upon entering this body.

But there are other modes of extending assistance than by giving a copper to a starving man. The effort to introduce agricultural implements and seeds into the South is indeed the act of a Samaritan. But let that assistance be so extended that not only the man who has been accustomed to wield the hoe and plant the fields of the South can reap the benefit of it, but that it may reach the poorer classes of the whites of the South, who have been educated to neither agricultural, commercial, nor manufacturing pursuits. Let your munificence be extended to every class. I take it that if this money is sent to the Freedmen's Bureau it will be filtered through the officers of that institution until but the smallest moiety of this $1,000,000 will be used for the requirements of any one State.

Suppose this $1,000,000 is spread over the State of Georgia alone. Does any gentleman believe that it would meet the necessities there? It is folly to say so, and any man who can calculate so as to put two and two together and tell what the result will be, will not make any such assumption.

This is meant then as a simple beginning. You mean then by adding this $1,000,000 upon the pretense of healing the wounds of the South to keep up the Freedmen's Bureau as the channel of alleviating the sufferings of the South. Do you believe that will be an acceptable channel to the poor whites of the South? Do you honestly believe that they will accept charity extended through that channel?

Sir, it seems to me, without charging upon gentlemen of the other side who have advocated this measure motives which they are so willing to impute to others, motives unworthy of human nature, unworthy of the name of charity, that this joint resolution carries with it no merits. It is claimed to be actuated by the spirit of the good Samaritan; but it looks very much like that stride and step taken by him who passed by on the other side.

Now, with regard to the requirements of agriculture in the South. Do gentlemen propose to inaugurate a sensible system of agriculture through the Freedmen's Bureau? Is the distribution of seeds by that bureau to supersede the distribution of seeds by your Agricultural Department, which has been established at such great expense? Take it from any point of view, practical, philanthropic, reasonable, or just, and to what does this measure come at last? The payment of the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau, through General Howard, taxing the laboring masses of the North to keep up an eleemosynary institution established for political purposes, for the purpose of maintaining the existing hatred between the races in the South. It is reduced to that and to that alone. If it does rest on that basis, then why reiterate these sentiments of hatred and animosity to the classes of the South? Why tolerate the degradation of the whites, and why so silent with regard to the utter degradation of the blacks?

Sir, if this measure had upon its face one single indication of thorough, ingenuous charity, I would advocate it. But as it comes before us to-day it is purely a political measure, got up in the worst spirit, and to be passed for no good except to benefit the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. BOYER. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this joint resolution will be adopted; that it will be passed promptly and with unanimity. I am not deterred from supporting it by the reasons given by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] based upon the fact that those who are to be the recipients of this bounty are the families of rebels; nor by the arguments of the two gentlemen from New York, [Mr. WOOD and Mr. CHANLER,] that this fund is to be distributed through the Freedmen's Bureau; that charity has not been asked at our hands by the starving population of the South through any direct appeal of their own; that the money proposed to be appropriated is not sufficient in amount to afford the required relief for the distresses which exist; and that it is likely to be misappropriated. None of these reasons which have been given by one or the other of these gentlemen for their opposition to this measure shall influence me to withhold from it my vote.

Mr. Chairman, twenty years ago, the Parliament of Great Britain voted $50,000,000 for the relief of the starving population of Ireland. We are asked to-day to appropriate but $1,000,000 for the relief of the starving people of the South, but one fiftieth part of the amount which the distresses of rebellious Ireland extorted from the humanity of monarchical England. And shall it be said that the great Republic of America is less merciful to her perishing children than was that nation whom we have been accustomed to denounce as the tyrant of the Indies and the oppressor of Ireland?

If the channel which is provided in this resolution for the distribution of the fund be objectionable, the answer is that it is the only channel immediately available for the purpose. If gentlemen on this side of the House are opposed to the Freedmen's Bureau, let them not object to its being converted into an instrumentality of usefulness and mercy. I accept the Freedmen's Bureau in this instance as the means of distribution, because the want to be supplied is immediate and pressing, and there is no other available instrumentality at hand. While we are talking some of our countrymen at the south are gasping, it may be, in the agonies of death for want of the food which we are asked out of our abundance to bestow upon them. The Freedmen's Bureau, if it honestly distribute this fund, is the very best agency by which it can be dispensed, because it is already organized and in actual operation, and because its agents are now residing at the South and understand the immediate necessities of the particular localities in which they happen to be stationed.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not stop to inquire whether the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau will misappropriate this fund or not. I shall not stop to make this inquiry, because I feel certain that a portion of the money at least will reach those for whom it is intended. And if but one half of this charity shall reach the suffering poor for whom it is designed I should vote for it, even although the other half should stick to the hands of the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. But what right have we without proof to presume that any portion of this fund will be misappropriated? We should have some evidence of that fact, before in a crisis like this we undertake on mere suspicion to withhold bread from the mouths of the starving people of any portion of our country. They must get it in this way or not at all.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] opposes the resolution because he says it does not provide a sufficient amount to relieve the distresses which he knows exist. If, then, the necessities of the South are so great that for the purpose of preserving its population from starvation more than $1,000,000 is needed, in Heaven's name why should we withhold this pittance? The true remedy lies in the opposite direction. If it be discovered that more is required let us vote for appropriating more money for the same purpose.

Mr. Chairman, if this Congress shall refuse to make this appropriation, I do not want to see introduced into this House any more resolutions in behalf of the suffering population of other countries. I do not want to see introduced here by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] resolutions of sympathy for the people of Ireland, as he did the other day, when he is not willing to cast his vote to appropriate a fund intended to rescue a portion of his own countrymen from the most horrible of deaths. I, for one, am willing to vote this appropriation and run the risk of its finding the objects for whom it is designed.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. While he is referring to the practice of England in reference to appropriating money to relieve the oppressed of Ireland, does he see any analogy between that case and this, inasmuch as we have oppressed and are oppressing the people of the South, and now propose to distribute alms to them as a satisfaction or reparation?

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Chairman, I do see an analogy, an analogy in both ways. We have oppressed the people of the South as England has oppressed the people of Ireland, and we are asked now to contribute a portion of our abundance to the relief of their necessities just as England contributed from her abundance to the relief of the necessities of the Irish people whom by her legislation she had oppressed.

Mr. WOOD. As compensation for political persecution.

Mr. BOYER. Not as compensation for political persecution. But I should be glad, indeed, if the majority in this Congress were to show a disposition to offer it even as a compensation for political persecution; I should be glad to see them begin here to make compensation. It may be when they get used to this form of humanity they will extend it a little further. It may be when they get used to this their sympathies may go forth, not only to the relief of the material necessities of the southern people, but to relieve their political necessities also. It may be when they get used to relieving them from starvation they may extend a helping hand toward them to relieve them of the military despotism which has just been fastened upon their necks.

But because the majority of this House will not go the whole length this day, it is no reason why I should refuse my support to a measure which in some degree does give relief to the suffering people of the South. I did not expect, at least from this side of the House, any opposition to this proposition. I regarded it as a practical test to ascertain to what extent the proscriptive legislation to which this House had become accustomed had produced a sort of ossification of the heart on the part of the majority. I thought it was a good measure to expose the inner lining of their right and left ventricles. But I am sorry to say that some gentlemen on this side of the House, with whom it has been my custom and pleasure to act on general matters of legislation, should take a different view of the subject, and by their opposition afford some sort of excuse to the other side for withholding in this instance the exercise of their humanity.

Mr. Chairman, the time I trust will come at some future day when the people of this country, of all sections, shall again dwell together in peace and harmony. The time I hope will come, if not in this generation at least in the next, when the foundations of our Government will again rest, as of old, in the affections and confidence of the whole people. That is the wisest legislation which hastens the consummation of this end so devoutly to be wished. That is the noblest as well as the wisest legislation which exhibits this great Government as a beneficent agent, clothed with mercy and magnanimity as well as with resistless power, able to enforce the authority of its laws against all opposers, but willing also to forgive, to protect, and to save.

The passage of this measure will remedy the partial and halting charity which has thus far characterized the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau. Its lawful authority does not at present extend so far as to enable it to minister to the necessities of any others than negroes, and those white men who come under the designation of southern "refugees." Congress has put millions of dollars into the hands of the Freedmen's Bureau, but prohibited its distribution for the relief of any other than these favored classes. This resolution is intended to put $1,000,000 into the hands of the officers of that bureau, to be distributed to starving men, women, and children, who are neither negroes nor refugees. Since we have the Freedmen's Bureau, let us at least ingraft upon it this feature of universal instead of restricted humanity. On the other side of the House I do trust there may be exhibited a feeling which will be some sort of answer, as far as it goes, to the imputation cast upon them, I think with some reason, that their humanity has become sectional and political. I trust gentlemen on the other side, in their enthusiastic desire to make treason odious will not include in the category of their penalties the starvation of any portion of the people of this country, whether they were formerly engaged in the rebellion or not. I trust that sort of ossification of the heart to which I have alluded may not have proceeded so far that there is left in their breasts no chord which will vibrate to any other touch than that of the negro and the office-holder.

Now, since we have thrown around our national flag the terrors of power and authority, and in the exercise of these attributes have harrowed the southern land and spread desolation throughout its borders, and brought starvation to the doors of its inhabitants, it is fit and decorous as well as safe to surround our national emblem with the halo of humanity, and take again within the shelter of its glorious folds our countrymen of all sections, parties, and complexions.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise simply to reply to a personal allusion. I watched with care the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER.] He has misrepresented my motives. He has used a term which I think expresses exactly what is the matter with himself. He has got ossification of the brain. If his mental faculties had been as enlarged as his heart he would have not found reason to have made the misstatement of my argument in order to adorn his own elegant speech.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOYER. I desire simply to say that my friend will never be open to the imputation of ossification of the brain; in his case it will be softening, not ossification. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. Thank you, sir. In that case the gentleman will never find that the intelligence which I have will induce me to misrepresent a friend.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to say to my friend that if I have misrepresented him, it was certainly unintentional, and I ask his pardon. I trust I may hereafter better understand him. I shall certainly always be willing when I do misunderstand and misrepresent him to make every apology and every honorable amend.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman is very apologetic. We all understand this sort of thing. We have to make flourishes and points. I understand the gentleman's benevolence now more thoroughly than I did before. All I have to say in regard to this matter is, that if my friend has not examined and understood the channel through which the money appropriated by this resolution has to pass, and does not interest himself as to how it is going to be spent, I believe I do understand it. This money is to be placed in the hands of a certain bureau, which was established during the war for a specific purpose, and which, notwithstanding all the ornamentation which the gentleman has thrown about it and all the terms which have been put into the bills which originated and continued the Freedmen's Bureau, has been exclusively intended for the benefit of the black race at the South. And I spoke in behalf of that race when I said that so far as the motive of this resolution went, as it appeared upon its face, if it was good I was for it. But, sir, I could not see how the millions of black men in the South were to be benefited by so limited an appropriation as this; and basing my argument upon the niggardness of the appropriation, I concluded it was merely meant to keep up the machinery of that bureau. That was my argument. I never assailed the good that might be done by the distribution of money among the poor and suffering. I only took the ground that because the appropriation was so limited they did not intend to do much, if any good, except so far as was consistent with the object of the organization and maintenance of that bureau. The gentleman has not advanced one argument to prove what I said to be unreasonable, but has assailed my motives. He is welcome to what he has made of it.

Mr. BOYER. I simply desire to reiterate that I had no intention of assailing any motive of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire, with the leave of the committee, to offer a substitute for the resolution. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the sum of $1,000,000 be appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in relieving the widows and children of Union soldiers starved to death in the rebel prisons of Andersonville, Salisbury, Libby, Millen, and Belle Isle.

I do not, sir, object to the resolution before the committee, nor do I in offering this substitute mean to foster in the slightest degree the idea that the money proposed to be appropriated by the original resolution will be improperly expended. On the contrary, I have great confidence in the gentleman who is at the head of that institution commonly called the Freedmen's Bureau.

I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it is the Bureau of Abandoned Lands, Refugees, and Freedmen, so that it covers in its wise and beneficent provisions every loyal and true element in the southern States, and there is no occasion to go further except as a matter of charity, and I have been taught to be just before I am generous. Sir, this resolution calls to mind the starved and emaciated form of my fellow-soldiers, as they passed through my hands while commissioner of exchange of prisoners as they returned from these deadly prisons, and I have thereby again been brought face to face with their widows and children, and until the country is able to make sufficient provision for them I am not in favor of putting my hand into the pocket of the already overtaxed North to be generous to the untaxed South.

Sir, I do not believe in the principle of this bill for another reason: while I listened to the very able report, which I wish the committee to understand was not volunteered by General Howard, but was drawn out by a resolution of the Senate, that there may be some sixty thousand whites and blacks in the whole South that need relief, yet I do not see how it is that we are called upon in this form of relief to step forward and from the Treasury of the United States make such an appropriation.

Let me call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side of the House to this fact: if they vote for this bill, what becomes of this vaunted doctrine of State rights? Suppose this war had not occurred, do you believe that upon any case of starvation, either at the South or in the North, it would have been believed by the strict constructionists of the Constitution that Congress had the constitutional power to make an appropriation for such purpose as this?

But, sir, I do not for myself take this ground. I am not one of those who now believe that this Government would be powerless if it were expedient and just to aid these men; but I object to the mode in which the money is proposed to be raised for this object. If you will pardon me a single personal allusion, in reference to what fell from the lips of my friend from Indiana, before me, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] in my absence from the House, and what I would not have dared to have obtruded on the committee but for that allusion, I will say that I have had some experience in a like case, for from the 15th June to the 15th December, 1862, I fed in the department of the Gulf thirty-four thousand and odd women and children, who would otherwise have starved, and whose husbands and fathers, many of them, were in the confederate army; but I did not tax the loyal North to obtain that relief. Under the war power I taxed the rich of the South to support the poor of the South. And I will go as far as he who goes farthest in that direction now to aid the same poor by any constitutional legislation.

The destitution of the South, as a whole, is much exaggerated. Let us remember that in the palmiest days of the South their cotton crop of two million bales sold for but ten cents a pound, and that there were in the South at the collapse of the rebellion two million bales of cotton that sold for from fifty to seventy-five cents a pound; perhaps sixty cents would be an average equivalent to six crops of the olden time, or nearly five hundred million dollars. If that were fairly distributed in the South, there would be no need to call upon us of the North to aid in the support of the southern people. It is because such firms as Frazier, Trenholm & Co. accumulated the resources of the South during the war; because the whole property of the South is aggregated in a few hands; because the President of the United States, acting as he believed rightly we must conclude, until it is judicially examined in another bar, gives back the property captured by the forces of the United States, to whom? To the poor men of the South? Oh, no; but to the men of wealth, the owners of the land, that the text has almost been verified which says, "To him who hath shall be given; and to him who hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath."

Now, after we have been told by the Executive that Congress is making appropriations so extravagant that he believes it will lead to repudiation of our national obligations, I trust we will pause before we make further appropriations for such purposes, and say at least we will first make those which will do justice to the widows and orphans of those who fought our battles.

And, then, we will take such property as comes to us from the war to repair the ravages of the war, both North and South. I for one ask no confiscation of any property that shall go into the pockets of the North. Thank God, our industry, our enterprise, our means of recuperation are such that we need none of it. But I do ask that there shall be legislation which will distribute the property, whether real or personal property, among those of the South whose labor has earned it, and who are now starving because they are deprived of the results of their labors. For such legislation, for the benefit of the masses of the South, I shall ever be ready to give my voice and my vote.

The property in the South, which belongs to us by the right of capture, every dollar of it, and which is ours and at our disposal by every principle ever yet enunciated from any judicial tribunal competent to cope with the subject—concerning that property I desire to see legislation which shall equalize the burdens of the war, now so grievous to be borne by the southern people. Besides, before I am called upon to be generous to the southern people, I desire to see an end of a kind of legislation which is common in the South, such legislation as in Mississippi, appropriating $20,000—and for what? To feed her starving poor? No, but to defend Jefferson Davis, who is luxuriating in Fortress Monroe, on a trial which will never take place.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BOYER. I would ask the gentleman whether, if such an appropriation was made by the legislative body to which he refers, that is any reason why the children of those who had nothing to do with that legislation should be left to starve? Ought those who had nothing to do with that legislation to be held accountable for it?

Mr. BUTLER. I can answer that question I think as it should be answered, in the light of the proprieties of governmental action. Governments must always deal with communities, not with individuals; Governments must always deal with the organized action of communities, not with the acts of individuals. The individual must partake of the character and suffer the fate of the community in which he resides. And if the men of the South make such legislation as I have specified through their organized government, it must be taken as the index by which our action toward them is to be guided.

Mr. BOYER. Let me ask one other question in this connection. Ought the people of Georgia to be left to starve because of objectionable legislation by the people of Mississippi?

Mr. BUTLER. By no means. And if the acts to which I refer had been singular as committed by the people of Mississippi alone, perhaps I might be content with striking the State of Mississippi from the benefits of this appropriation and stop there. But did not the gentleman see the statement but the other day that the ladies of Texas had sold a large quantity of confederate uniforms which they had made up for confederate soldiers while the rebel armies were yet in the field? And what did they do with the proceeds of that sale? Did they appropriate them for the benefit of the starving poor in Texas, of whom the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau reports to us there are thousands? Not at all. They sent the moneys arising from that sale as an endowment to the college in Virginia over which the rebel General Robert E. Lee presides, in order, I suppose, that the youth of the South might be taught in the same manner as heretofore their duties of loyalty to their country, their obligations to their fellow-men, and the binding effects of their sworn oaths, which their teacher for himself had violated.

"Straws show which way the wind blows."

Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] to notice another straw which shows the current of southern feeling. But a day or two since we saw an account of two gamecocks being sent as a present to Robert E. Lee from the soldiers of the army of northern Virginia. Would it not have been better to have boiled them to feed some of those starving children of their comrades that the gentleman is so anxious about? [Laughter.] I insist that we must take these things as indices of the temper of the people of the South, and so govern ourselves in our legislation. Let them learn that so long as there is such action on the part of their public bodies, so long as they follow the lead of the men who have led them to destruction, destruction can be the only result. Let them learn that in the reconstruction which I trust is soon to be accomplished in a loyal manner they must repudiate their old leaders, and by a course of legislation which shall tend to make a division of the lands among all the people, give to every man the means of at least fulfilling the primeval curse "by the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat thy bread," thus affording the needed relief to a suffering people.

I regret as much as the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other the state of destitution which is represented as existing in the South; and I feel that I have a right to say that when I had the power I did all that in me lay to relieve such destitution, for which I have received thus far no other reward than a delightful shower of obloquy. When the question is presented to me, sir, how much I will give as a private citizen toward relieving distress in the South, I trust that my subscription will not fall behind that which my friend from Pennsylvania, in the goodness of his heart, may contribute in accordance with our respective means.

But, sir, I am now speaking as a legislator. I say that in these Halls of legislation we have no right to pass over the starving widows and children of our soldiers, for whom we have yet made no sufficient provision as a nation, and for the care of whom every State in the Union, and the State I have the honor in part to represent more than, or as much as any other, is burdened with taxation; we have no right as legislators to put our hands into the Treasury, supplied by taxation, to meet the claims of generosity before the claims of justice are satisfied. Will any gentleman in the House, in voting upon this substitute, say that generosity prompts him to vote $1,000,000 to the starving women and children of the South, while justice to the overtaxed North prevents him from relieving the starving widows and children of the noble heroes who gave up their lives for their country at Andersonville, Belle Isle, and Libby?

It is stated in the able report of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau that sixty thousand starving women and children have reported to him. Why, sir, the thirty thousand and more of Union soldiers starved in those prisons have left on an average more than two dear ones dependent upon them. Therefore I insist again, leaving off where I began, that we should be just before we are generous, and take from the disloyal property-holders of the South the means of repairing the great wrong they have done by misleading their humbler fellow-citizens into a great war and into this subsidiary rebellion after the war is over.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee any great length of time in discussing the proposition before us. I have entire confidence, sir, in the integrity, as well as the good intentions in all things, of the noble officer in charge of the Freedmen's Bureau. His generosity and philanthropy is coextensive with all suffering humanity. Any appeal addressed to him on behalf of any class of people who may be represented as suffering is sure to find in his bosom a sympathetic response, and, owing to the generosity of his nature, may sometimes surpass that which would by others not seem just and proper under the circumstances. Now, sir, I ask who is this that demands this unprecedented charity at the hands of Congress? What class of people is it? Is it the poor downtrodden freedmen? Is it the poor white people? or is it the families of the leaders of the rebellion that have caused so much weeping and wailing in our land?

We have no information further than that there are some sixty thousand people who are suffering, or who soon will be in a suffering condition in the rebel States. I would be as willing as anyone to put my hand in my pocket and so far as I am able relieve the sufferings of any unfortunate class of people. But looking at this resolution as I do, I cannot put my hand in the pockets of the tax-payers, many of whom are as poor as those who pretend to ask this Government to be made an alms-house, and assist in appropriating $1,000,000 as a pension to one-armed and one-legged rebel soldiers or their families of that class. This resolution, sir, is nothing more than a dodge to make pensioners of rebels that can not be provided for in the usual way. You do not put them on the United States pension-roll, by the side of the wounded soldiers and widows and orphans of those who died in defense of their country; but by another mode you put them on the bounty of the Government. This House but yesterday refused to pass a bill equalizing the bounties of the soldiers that fought on the side of their country in the great struggle for the existence of the Union. Yet without accomplishing that, without simply providing for our own widows and crying orphans that prattle about the return of those they will see no more, we are asked to give $1,000,000 for the purpose of supplying the wants of somebody, without knowing who they are.

When you talk about dealing out $1,000,000 of commissary stores to these poor people of the South, we but have to reflect for a moment to see that labor is at a high price in the New England factories; and when we look at the vast domain of the Northwest, and find in many instances the plow has been permitted to stand in the furrow because labor has been so high, and if any portion of the poor people anywhere or laboring classes toward whom gentlemen desire to be so generous are suffering the road is broad and open to the Northwest, where the poor and laboring classes of all climes and all complexions are invited by our smiling prairies. We need their labor and are ready to pay them for it, we will help them to live until harvest season, we will alleviate their wants and allay their sufferings; but they must apply in the proper manner. They must show a willingness to work and earn their livelihood by the sweat of their face as our own people have always done. Sir, this is not the first time we have been asked to show our generosity to this same people. During the war against traitors and rebels, and while we were fighting the men who sought the life of this nation and the lives of its defenders, we were feeding and supporting their wives and children left behind who were by the fortunes of war cast within our lines. I have seen many times long lines of them at the doors of the commissary department at different posts receiving food, while we were fighting their husbands and friends at the front. They were not then above asking us to feed them, while they despised us and our cause, and I have no doubt the same class are now to be fed under this appropriation. I hear no complaint on the part of the freedmen or from any class who have tried to preserve and protect themselves.

There is a class of people in the South that never did make bread, and never will, who will always be starving, and on the bounty of the Government if we will allow them to become pensioners. If they had used ordinary industry and had energy they would not to-day be in want of assistance to save them from starvation. There is no spot on earth more inviting than those southern fields. They are carpeted in grain, and decorated by the hand of the Almighty with the rarest and most beautiful flowers. It wants but the well-directed energy and industry of its inhabitants to make it as prosperous and abundant as any land the sun shines upon. Yet it is in this land of beauty and richness we are asked to feed the mouths of sixty thousand people, and while we are in hot haste to tax our people to feed them what do we see? In the State of Arkansas a short time ago an appropriation was made providing for the pensioning of soldiers not provided for by Congress, meaning the rebel soldiers, not for the weeping widow and crying orphan of the Union soldier. No, sir; but money they could appropriate for the rebel soldiers, their widows and orphans. So in other rebel States they have appropriated money for colleges and schools of a military character, where treason again can be taught and made respectable. If these States can provide money for such purposes, I ask could they not dole out a few mouthful of bread to the starving people so eloquently appealed for here to-day.

I could cite many other instances where money has been provided by their rebel Legislatures to promote treason and benefit those who have cursed the land by steeping their souls in perjury and their hands in the blood of Union men; but no instance can I find where they have shown a willingness to feed the poor freedman or the poor white man. Sir, let this Congress, as done heretofore, encourage industry, invite these people to come to the great West, where liberty is known and loyalty loved, where energy, industry, and labor is rewarded. If Congress, however, is to be turned into a charitable institution, to support all classes of people who do not try to support themselves, you may then appropriate $1,000,000 every month, and the more you appropriate the more people will be starving at the end of every month so long as there is a dollar or a man to pay taxes.

Tell me, sir, that this money is not to go into the hands and mouths of these people that attempted to destroy this Government. Buy your $1,000,000 worth of rations, send them to the different posts, to the commanders in the different parts of the South, distribute your commissary stores to the various officers throughout that country, how will they be issued? They will be issued upon the statements of parties that they have need of them. Who will make these statements? They will be more likely to be made by the men and women who have attempted to destroy you and me than by those who have revered the flag and loved their country.

I have seen the families of the men with their ten thousand broad acres come and ask for provisions, and I have seen the provisions given. These men have all manner of devices to attain their ends. A very common dodge used to be like this: a lady living on a plantation with her fifty or seventy-five slaves, whose husband was in the rebel army, would send one of her colored servants to make application at the commissary's department for provisions for the whole of the slaves. She controlled their labor and would send them on this errand. The provisions would be ordered to be given, and when they were received they would be divided among the whole family. So it was, and so it will be again. Appropriate this money and the man who owns his broad acres with his hired laborers will resort to the same trick and receive the rations.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. May I make an inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand him to say that the southern people were in the habit of using their negroes for the purpose of procuring provisions from the officers of the Army by a dodge. I wish to know if that was a very common practice among these negroes, and if so, whether those negroes who practiced this deceit were considered as loyal men at the time.

Mr. LOGAN. They were considered loyal; and I never knew a disloyal negro during the war. [Laughter.] But I will tell the gentleman this, that they have been subject to the will of their masters for such a length of time that they know no better than to obey them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentleman to say that fifty negroes would obey one woman and cheat the officers of the Army; and do it without knowing what he did, and still be loyal.

Mr. LOGAN. It was cheating the officers of the Army or Government; it was a cheat on the part of the person who directed them to do it. We issued the rations because we believed the statement of the negroes, but afterward we learned the manner in which the provisions were disposed of.

Mr. BOYER. One question. If it had been known that these negroes who thus applied for rations did so for the purpose of saving their mistress and her family from starvation, would the gentleman have considered it proper for the officers to have given the rations?

Mr. LOGAN. So far as I am concerned I should have obeyed orders, no matter what I thought. But the gentleman certainly ought not to be astonished at a dodge of this kind. Those people did that upon the same principle that the northern copperheads dodged the draft. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has dodged my question. [Laughter.] He has failed to answer it, but replies evasively that he should have obeyed orders. I would not have supposed a gentleman so opposed to dodging would have set us such an example at this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Well, so far as my qualifications for dodging are concerned, the gentleman will probably learn more about them at some future time when he gets better acquainted with me. [Laughter.] I have no disposition to dodge anything. I only assert facts; the gentleman can draw his own inferences from them. And I assert that the same thing will occur again; not with the colored people any more than with any other class. But I tell the gentleman now that I hear no appeal coming from the starving people of Missouri, although that State suffered almost as much as any other on account of war. But because it is a loyal State, because the loyal portion of the people got control and held it firmly in the Union, we are not called upon to appropriate money to feed them.

Mr. BOYER. I ask the gentleman whether Missouri is not included in the provisions of this resolution, whether it is not an appropriation for the South and Southwest?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not understand it as applying to Missouri. I do not understand that there is any report embracing any portion of Missouri in this condition; or claiming that any States are except those which have been in insurrection against the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. Missouri is not embraced within the scope of this resolution at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I say to the gentleman that we do not come here from Missouri or Illinois, or from any of the northern or northwestern States asking alms from this Congress.

Although there are many poor people in the Northwest, we do not understand that we have a right to come to Congress to be fed. We have all suffered during the war and have many people left penniless. There was suffering before the war, and starving people all over the country, and who ever thought of asking Congress to be the dispenser of charities to a class of people who would not help themselves. But an age of treason has taught us strange things; punish nobody, compromise with traitors, and then feed them whenever some one suggests it. All this is done for States that rebelled, but in the loyal States the voice appealing in needs for help must be provided for in some other way, and our anxiety, our charity, our sympathy turned in a southerly direction.

Oh, ye poor of the North, how unfortunate you were, if you ask alms of the Congress of the United States, that you had not lived in the land of treason! Now, sir, although I entertain so much respect for the Superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau, yet if you appropriate all the money for all the charitable purposes for which he may be inclined to ask, you may appropriate millions on millions for all classes of poor people South; and may also feed the people of Washington city so long as it remains the capital of the nation. And all this will be done with the best intentions on his and your part. I have no doubt much money is being used to-day by this Government for the support, unwittingly, of families who fostered and nourished the late rebellion. Ay, sir, and families, too, who before this rebellion never wore a garment except at Government expense; who never had a spear of grass to grow in their yards or a flower to spring up in their gardens that was not watered by the drippings of the Treasury of the United States of America.

Sir, you will see by this resolution that those who should be considered the favored children of this land will not be included among the starving people now to be relieved at the hands of Congress; and I appeal to honorable members to say if charities are to be dispensed by Congress. It shall not be dispensed to one portion of the country more than another. Put not your hands into the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of fattening and fostering treason again in the land that gave it birth and where it grew into manhood. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] said he was willing to open his great heart to these suffering people. So am I willing to do so in a proper manner when much deserving. But, sir, whence comes this suffering? It was not by our act, not by the act of the people North; it was not in accordance with our wishes or our desires, but by their own act, their own indiscretion, their own wrong, their own crime against their country. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] says we should do this act to encourage the people and show them our affection for them, or words to that effect. It seems to me that we have shown our forbearance toward these people. We have offered them everything that they could ask. Proposition after proposition has been tendered them only to be spurned with scorn and contempt. And if you were tendering this money to them to-day through their rebel Legislatures, it would be spurned by them; but in this manner, when all can say I never had any of your charities, I have no doubt it will be very acceptable.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I would ask the gentleman if he is in favor of allowing to starve the twenty-four thousand two hundred and thirty-eight colored people, who General Howard says will starve to death unless they are assisted in some way?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not in favor of allowing anybody to starve if I can help it. I do not want any man, or any woman, or any child to starve. But I will say to the gentleman this: that it has not been brought to my knowledge that they are starving more than are other people; nor has it been yet brought to my knowledge that these people are in such a condition that they could not relieve themselves by proper industry and exertion on their part. Nor has it been brought to my knowledge that the wealthy people in these States are not able to put their hands into their own pockets and give this charity for the purpose of saving the lives of these people, just as well as the wealthy people of the North can do it. In my own State, when we have destitute people, we put our hands in our own pockets and provide for them; we do not ask Congress to do it. When the gentleman says that this is for the benefit of colored persons, that statement is not correct. The present appropriation, if confined to the classes who come under the Freedmen's Bureau is, sufficient. General Howard tells us in his report that sufficient appropriation has already been made to be expended under his direction to supply the class embraced, and if that be true, it is his duty to provide for these twenty or thirty odd thousand starving colored people at the South; and he says that he has money enough to do this, $1,500,000 having been appropriated for the purpose. What is the propriety of appropriating another million when General Howard says that he has abundant means if it be confined to his Department?

I am told by a gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] that General Howard stated to him this morning that this appropriation, while it might be useful, had not been asked by him; but that he had reported it as he was directed to do. Now, I am opposed to this House being directed by anybody to do anything in reference to any of the people of this country that is not appropriate to be done. Sir, in this free land there should be no paupers of this kind, and the millions of dollars of property given up to rebels by assent of this Government was a charity improperly bestowed, and we should be sure of what we do in this instance. There is no State, either loyal or disloyal, that is not able by a light tax on themselves to support their own poor; and so long as this is the case I for one am not willing to bow our people down with such burdens, when reason and justice are against it, although such appeals can be made in favor of suffering, many times upon a supposed state of facts that does not exist. Sir, this is all I desire to say.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that this joint resolution would not have met with any opposition in this House, and especially upon the Republican side of it; and, above all things, I had hoped that after the record made by the Thirty-Ninth Congress no Republican would undertake to say in this Hall that it is not warranted by the Constitution to provide for the relief of the poor of any part of this country by an appropriation out of our common Treasury.

Why, sir, at the first session of the last Congress a bill was introduced upon the Republican side of the House, which I had the honor, in part, to aid in passing, which appropriated out of the common Treasury of the United States for the support of refugees and freedmen in the several States lately in insurrection not less than $7,000,000. And yet, sir, we are to be told to-day that that legislation is not warranted by the Constitution! I trust that those gentlemen who recorded their votes by yeas and nays in favor of the appropriation for this purpose by the Thirty-Ninth Congress will not take a step backward, and concede that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is right in the position which he has assumed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I must have made myself illy understood; what I said was, that gentlemen on the other side, the strict constructionists of the Constitution, would have said in the earlier days—before the war—that it was unconstitutional to make any such appropriation; but that for myself I had got far beyond that idea. I think we have a right not only to appropriate money to feed these people, but to appropriate money to govern them; to make them do exactly what we say they shall do, and omit to do exactly what we say they shall not do. They are entirely in our hands, and, so far as I am concerned, I have no doubt about the power.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am very glad to know that the gentleman does not object to the power to make this appropriation, and yet he certainly objects to the object of the joint resolution, and undertakes to cut it off by a substitute limiting our charity to the widows and orphans of those who suffered in the Libby prison, at Andersonville, and Belle Isle.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Ohio concedes to the General Government the power affirmed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BINGHAM. It is too late, Mr. Chairman, for the gentleman to address to me an inquiry of that sort. I have too often during the session just closed and before, declared in my place here that the States lately in insurrection are as exclusively under the legislative power of the United States Government, until they shall be again restored to their constitutional relations with the consent of Congress, as is the District of Columbia, to admit of doubt about my position on that question. But that is aside from the present discussion.

The gentleman from Massachusetts admits that he has no constitutional objections to urge against this bill; yet he objects to it, and offers here a substitute which is to exclude from the charitable consideration of this Congress everybody save those who are already provided for by your existing laws in twofold, threefold, fourfold, fivefold the measure of relief proposed by this bill. Sir, for one I trust that so long as reason holds a place in my brain I shall never forget that education and charity are at least the cheap defense of nations.

It is enough for me to know that within the jurisdiction of the common Government of this country there are men, women, and children who are suffering from famine, lifting up their haggard faces, stretching forth their skinny fingers, and asking for leave to eat of the crumbs that fall from your well-supplied tables. "Tell it not in Gath; publish it not in the streets of Askelon," that the American Congress, having the control of such resources as never before acknowledged the sway of any other Government, will permit sixty thousand of their countrymen to perish for bread within the limits of their own jurisdiction. Especially let not the Fortieth Congress be false to the record of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and interpose to a proposition of this kind any such quibbling objections as have this day been insisted upon.

If the widows and orphans of those who perished at Andersonville and Libby are not already sufficiently provided for by existing legislation I am ready to vote out of the national Treasury additional supplies. But, sir, by no pretense of aiding them am I going to be diverted from contributing, so far as I may be able, to carry into execution this bill, which has come to us from the Senate, where it has been passed by an almost unanimous vote of our own friends.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman, with his permission, whether he does not believe that if an investigation should be made there would be found throughout the northern States sixty thousand persons who have not in their possession bread for the next year; and who have no prospect of having it unless they earn it; and if so, would there not be just as much propriety in our voting money to supply them with bread as making an appropriation to supply sixty thousand southern people?

Mr. BINGHAM. If I understand the gentleman, he is inquiring of me whether he voted in accordance with his oath and the requirements of the Constitution during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, when he voted to appropriate $7,000,000 for that very purpose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I did not ask the gentleman anything about our constitutional right to vote money in this way—

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, sir, I understand the gentleman to ask me about our power to make such an appropriation; and I say that it is too late for any Republican member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to raise that question. In the Thirty-Ninth Congress we did this very thing; and I propose to follow that example in the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman does not meet my question. I did not raise any constitutional question at all. I simply asked for light in regard to the propriety of Congress voting money for this purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, sir, if there is no constitutional objection, I think no man living in the nineteenth century, in the serene light of Christian revelation, can question the propriety of feeding the poor, or can stop to haggle and inquire whether the man famishing at his door has been his friend or his enemy.

He will not forget the divine teaching of our Master, whose intense holiness shed majesty over the manger and the straw; who by His own lips commands us to love our enemies, and by the tongue of his Apostle enjoins: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink."

I trust gentlemen will make no more question about the propriety of this measure. It is not a question of propriety, but of duty. It is enough for me to say that the Christian warrior, Major General Howard, the Havelock of the American Army—the man who won his laurels upon the immortal field of Gettysburg, upon whose rocky crest the sacrifice was made of twenty thousand braves who perished in the fires of that dread conflict in defence of our country—is to distribute these alms which he asks at our hands. It is enough, sir, for me to know that he recommends it and is to be the almoner of our bounty. No dollar of this money will cling to his hands. Allow General Howard to have the disposition of this $1,000,000, as of the $7,000,000 appropriated by the last Congress, and when he finds men suffering for bread he will feed them. Who will object to that?

Mr. FARNSWORTH rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman must excuse me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say I will strike hands with the gentleman in the grace of Christian charity, although I cannot follow him as high as he goes in flights of fancy. What I desire is an answer to my question. Should an investigation be made throughout the North, would not more than sixty thousand persons be found who have not bread enough in their possession for the next year, and who have no prospect of obtaining it except they raise it? If so, then is it not our duty to hunt out in New York, in Cincinnati, in Chicago, and various other cities the poor people there and feed them?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the organized represented States of this Union contain sixty thousand men or any considerable number of persons for whom there is no provision for bread. I do believe, on the other hand, in every one of those States not materially disturbed by the late conflict of arms, there are ample provisions made by existing law for the support of their poor. I know it is so in my own State, and I say there is not sixty thousand, nor sixty, nor even ten men within the limits of that great Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent, for whom there does not exist to-day an ample fund provided by law to supply their necessary wants. I trust the gentleman is answered.

But, sir, this appropriation is meant for the people in the yet unorganized southern States, who are not yet permitted by our own law to organize local State governments. We have rightfully declared that the people of those States shall not exercise those privileges and functions until certain preliminary steps shall have been taken. Pending this movement, we are reinforced by the head of the Bureau of Freedmen, Major General Howard, that there are sixty thousand persons in those States who, not by want of industry or care or providence, but by reason of their crops having perished in the field by the visitation of Heaven, must suffer for bread before the spring crops can be produced, and therefore he asks this appropriation. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who rendered good service in the field, asks us to apply in time of peace to the people of the southern country the iron rule of war. Sir, I cannot consent to that. No war rocks the continent, no armed rebellion threatens with overthrow the institutions of the country. The pillars of the holy temple of our liberties do not tremble in the storm of battle; the whole heavens are no longer covered with blackness, and the habitations of the people are no longer filled with lamentation and sorrow for their beautiful slain upon the high places of the land! Thanks be to God! the harvest of death is ended and the sickle has dropped from the hands of the "pale reapers" on the field of mortal combat.

Sir, you may apply in the day of war the iron rule of war, and say that the innocent and unoffending in the beleaguered city shall perish with the guilty; but when war's dread alarm has ended, as happily it has with us, when the broken battalions of rebellion have surrendered to the victorious legions of the Republic, let no man stand within the forum of the people and utter the horrid blasphemy that you shall not have regard for the famishing poor, that you shall not give a cup of water to him that is ready to perish in the name of our Master, that you shall not even relieve the wants of those who have never offended against the laws. The unoffending little children are not enemies of your country or of mine; the crime of treason is not upon their souls. Surely, surely they are not to be denied your care. The great French patriot, banished from the empire for his love of liberty, gathered little children around him in his exile at Guernsey, and fed them from his own table, uttering the judgment of our common humanity in its best estate: "Little children at least are innocent, for God wills it so."

The majority of those who are to be the beneficiaries of your bounty never lifted their hands against your flag; they are unoffending children, the children of the poor.

The men who own the broad acres of the South are not the men to whom alms are to be distributed by General Howard. The great majority to whom this bounty will go are the children of poverty. Some of them perchance may have been driven by a cruel and enforced conscription to serve the rebellion; but the great majority of those to whom this charity will go, if you pass the bill, are widows and orphan children. Under no pretense of assisting the orphan and widow of those who suffered and died in the prisons of Libby and Andersonville, as martyrs only can suffer and die, will I refuse my support to this resolution of the Senate. The sacred dust of those perished braves would rebuke me if I did. Our lost braves know that mercy is an attribute of God himself.

Mr. Chairman, if their widows and children are not already sufficiently provided for, in God's name provide for them abundantly. I am ready to vote any additional needed relief to them. I have voted hitherto, I know, tenfold the supplies to them that are proposed in this resolution. If gentlemen will take the pains to make the computation, it will be found that this joint resolution provides only to the amount of a fraction over eighteen dollars per capita to save sixty thousand people from destitution during the space of five months. That is the head and front of its offending. Do not, then, I pray you, ask that this Government shall degrade itself in the presence of the civilized world by refusing supplies to its own citizens who are famishing for bread, and stop to inquire of the starving thousands whether they were friends or enemies. Sir, you cannot discriminate, if you would, between friends and enemies when famishing men ask for bread.

We might learn a lesson upon this subject by words that come down to us through three thousand years from Pagan antiquity, when famine swept over Thrace, and a father in his dying agony, appealing to that charity which is the divinest of all the virtues, and which is as universal as the material structure of man, cried out, "Xanthus, good Xanthus, save my child from famine."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the remarks that I have to make upon this question, I desire to pay my humble homage to that eloquent speech, and the beautiful spirit with which it was made, that has just fallen from my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

It is not my purpose in considering this subject to do so in any political or partisan view. I have I think a higher and a purer motive. The information comes to me through truthful and reliable sources that my fellow-beings in the South are now suffering for the want of food, and my motive in voting and in advocating this appropriation is to relieve them. I do not mean to be led astray from that purpose by the technicalities of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] for whom I entertain great respect, nor do I mean to be driven to support this measure by the blood-thirsty acrimony of some gentlemen who have spoken this morning.

The debate has taken a wide and a curious range, but the greatest curiosity of all is exhibited by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who rises in his place and makes an appeal to the handful of gentlemen on this side of the House to cast our votes against this appropriation, because it is in opposition to the time-honored principles of the party we represent. For myself I spew his appeal from my mouth, and if I were allowed to answer for those around me in whom he seeks to enkindle those favorite principles, I would say et tu, Brute. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, here are people suffering and starving for want of food. Why should we not extend to them help? I know no more humane motive, nor one which springs from a nobler breast, than to extend help according to our ability to save from starvation people who are unable to procure food for themselves. This we, as the Representatives of the people, are able to do, and we shall be justified in doing it on the score of economy.

Sir, as regards the condition of the Treasury I have during four long years watched the extravagance of two Congresses, and I have in my humble way endeavored to resist many extravagant appropriations. But here we have a Treasury overflowing with $150,000,000, and we have a proposition before us to appropriate $1,000,000 for a starving people. Sir, while my constituents have always encouraged me in resisting the extravagance of Congress, I shall not be ashamed to look them in the face and say that in voting this appropriation I did it from the impulses of humanity, and I venture that with one voice they will say to me, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Chairman, I approve of the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and in making the few remarks that I intend to make on this subject I may possibly be betrayed into saying something that may be considered as personal. I approve of it because I know that there are thousands of suffering widows and orphan children in the North whose husbands and parents have died by starvation in the rebel prisons of the South. Mr. Chairman, I think that I myself have suffered as much from the starvation of our soldiers as any member of this House or any man in the country. At the beginning of the war a company was raised in my immediate neighborhood called the "Covode cavalry;" they were commanded by one of my sons. Of that company alone twenty-four were starved to death at Andersonville. Sir, I cannot look out of my house to-day without seeing the widows and orphans of those who thus suffered in rebel prisons at the South. Of a regiment commanded by another son of mine one hundred and sixty-six were captured when our Army fell back, under General Meade, to Centerville, one hundred and forty-two of whom were starved to death at Andersonville. My son was among the number there captured. Have we no sympathy for the widows and orphans of these men? My youngest son suffered, as it were, the torments of the damned for twenty months in Andersonville, and my eldest fell at the head of his regiment near Richmond, leaving a family whom I have to aid every day. I do not ask the Government to come to my relief, but I do protest against being taxed to feed the families of those in the South who were engaged in carrying on this rebellion.

More than this, sir, I know that it is not the poor who will get this bounty, but the impudent. I have had some experience in the South, not only during the war, but after its close, and I have seen poor Union men, who came up for relief have to stand back and allow impudent rebels to come up and demand of the commissary their rations. I have seen that over and over again. It is not the poor, but the impudent who avail themselves of the bounty of the Government. I am therefore opposed to this appropriation unless an equal amount shall be appropriated to relieve the sufferings of those whose husbands and fathers and brothers were starved to death in rebel prisons.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Chairman, I have but a word to say. I cannot vote for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] We have heard but one side of the question; I want to show the other. As I understand this matter, many of the persons who are to be benefited by this measure, if it should pass, live in the mountain regions of Alabama and Georgia. I know from private letters, as well as from public report of their sufferings. I know that they divided their last corn-cake with our soldiers who escaped from rebel prisons, going homeward to the North. I cannot deny charity to those people. While I have no sympathy with the rebel leaders, I have with the orphans of those who were led by them into rebellion, and I can take them by the hand, even though they be the children of soldiers who fell fighting my own regiment. It is strange that gentlemen who voted for the Freedmen's Bureau bill should talk now about precedents and principles where the distinction is so plain. When the bill passed yesterday appropriating a large amount for the benefit of the destitute negroes of this District, why did not the gentleman from Massachusetts object and bring in his substitute? Sir, when the Indians are upon the war-path, and they capture prisoners, they bring them home and turn them over to their squaws for torture. Now, there are divers ways of showing loyalty; but it seems to me that the starvation of women and children is a very poor way of showing it. That is all I have to say.

Mr. DONNELLY. This bill is based upon the declaration contained in it, that there is actual starvation existing in the South. It is upon that ground that I shall vote for it, and upon that ground that I shall oppose the amendment offered as a substitute for it.

Let me say here, that by the terms of the Senate resolution the benefits to be derived from it are not confined to the rebel States, but extend to the southern and southwestern States, in which, in the language of the resolution, "starvation or extreme want" exists. This is not, therefore, a measure for the benefit of the rebel States alone. We know that throughout that whole country there has been a desolating war, that their houses, their farms, their implements of labor, their supplies of food, of seed-corn, of domestic animals have been to a great extent destroyed; and we know more than that, that in many parts of the country they have suffered from a failure of the crops. We have evidence sufficient before us in the communication of General Howard which has been alluded to here, that "extreme destitution and starvation" do exist there. It is not for us to ask by what means they have reached that condition; whether they have exercised proper industry and due diligence to prevent the condition of things now upon them. It is sufficient for us to know that within the limits of our country, under the flag of the United States, human beings, our fellow-citizens, are suffering from the pangs of starvation, are in imminent danger of that most terrible of all deaths, to silence at once all the clamor of political hatred. In the presence of death the acrimony of politics should disappear; nothing should be heard but the voice of humanity.

I have somewhere read of a gallant Swede of the army of Charles XII, who, at the close of one of the great battles fought under that sovereign, sought to assist a wounded and dying enemy, giving him water to drink from his own canteen. In the very moment that he was thus aiding him the dying man, still full of the rage of the battle-field, attempted to take the life of his benefactor. The gallant soldier nevertheless stayed his hand, and aided with others to bear him to a place of safety. When the king heard of the noble act he sent for the soldier and rewarded his humanity by promotion. He asked him, however, how it came that he did not strike an enemy who thus sought to take his life even while he was relieving him. "Sire," he replied, "my heart would not permit me to strike a prostrate and helpless man."

So I say now, in the presence of this suffering and this death, I have not the heart to remember anything save only that these people are human, and "being human, pitiable."

I am sorry to hear these appeals made to the natural prejudices and natural bitterness which exist in our hearts. I am sorry to hear these references made to Andersonville and Libby prisons. Let us recollect that if we, the Representatives of the American people, after having been brought face to face by official proof with the knowledge of this starvation in our land, now withhold the hand of relief, then in the eyes of the civilized world we will have placed ourselves upon a level with the very rebels who starved our gallant men to death.

Neither should the cry of economy be raised here. I have shown in my former remarks upon this bill that what we are asked to give is but a pittance from each individual in this land; a pittance which no man would miss; a pittance which no liberal-hearted man would refuse.

The chronicles of England preserve the memory of an Anglo-Saxon bishop who in a time of famine took the gold and silver ornaments from the altars of his churches and the decorations from their walls and sold them to purchase food for the starving multitudes; and when one, who looked rather to the letter than the spirit of religion, would have rebuked him for his act, his noble answer, which will live through all time, was given: "That it was better that the living temples of the Lord should be fed, even though the dead temples of the Lord should go empty."

This war is at an end. The bitterness and acrimony that accompanied it should die with it. We must base this Government of ours upon the love of the people. We cannot permit the now empty seats upon the other side of this Chamber to be filled by a race of men who will be the hereditary enemies of the land they assist in governing. This Government, as it must rest upon the free will of the people, must rest also upon the love of the people. And I say to you that no more potent agency can be found to that end than the passage of such a measure as this. There is no man in the South who will receive for his starving family the aid provided by this joint resolution, however ignorant, however degraded he may be, but will understand that that help comes to him from the North which he has been taught to hate; from the Yankee Congress, which he has been taught to regard as his malignant enemy. I say to you that it will be more potent than reams of arguments and tomes of speeches. It will reach the hearts of that people, and must produce good fruit for the benefit of the whole land.

The day will come so surely as God reigns when the southern people will understand that every step which has been taken by the North has been for their benefit. The day will come when the industry of the South reviving, with prosperity existing throughout its whole length and breadth, under equitable and just laws, the free southern people will rise up and call blessed the men they are now taught to hate.

Mr. UPSON. I would ask the gentleman where he finds the evidence of the starvation of which he has spoken?

Mr. DONNELLY. I find the declaration in the letter of General Howard, an officer in whom we all have the highest confidence.

Mr. UPSON. I have read that letter, and I cannot find the evidence there.

Mr. DONNELLY. General Howard says in his letter that a total of fifty-six thousand nine hundred persons, white and black, "will need food from some source before the next crop can relieve them." And, furthermore, he stated to the committee of the Senate that there were large numbers of persons in actual want and in imminent danger of starvation.

It is feared by some that this appropriation may be misapplied. But, sir, I for one have confidence in the officer in whose hands this appropriation will be placed. I believe that, under his direction, it will be applied only to the purposes recited in the bill—to meet cases of "starvation and extreme want."

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to say to the gentleman that the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill falls short by $500,000 of the sum stated in General Howard's report to be necessary to feed those starving people.

Mr. DONNELLY. Then I would suggest to the gentleman from New York to move at the proper time such an amendment as will supply the deficiency.

Mr. CHANLER. I will if the gentleman will yield for that purpose. I have an amendment written.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment would not now be in order.

Mr. DONNELLY. It does not become us, Mr. Chairman, to refuse to take the best we can get because it is not all that we could desire. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has sought to defeat this bill by offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute, to appropriate the amount asked for to the widows and children of those of our soldiers who perished of starvation at the Andersonville and Libby prisons and the other rebel prisons in the South; and he claims that those widows and children are now enduring great want. I must think, Mr. Chairman, that there is exaggeration here. I do not believe that the American people will suffer any such suffering to fall upon the families of the men to whom we owe such an incalculable debt of gratitude. If there be such destitution the remedy is here in these Halls. Amend your pension laws; extend your bounty laws; expand the limits of your liberality, and there will be no opposition from those who advocate the passage of this bill. For one I feel that sitting here and legislating for a united country, preserved by the valor of our soldiers, and but for whom these Halls would now be in the hands of rebels, we cannot do too much for the men who saved us.

Mr. Chairman, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] should be adopted, what will be its effect? It will be heralded all over the South. The demagogues who led the ignorant people of the South into rebellion, and who still to a great extent retain their confidence, will point to it as an unerring indication of the hatred of the North toward the southern people. It will add another link to the chain in which they hold that people. The very laws passed by the rebel States, and which have been alluded to here, are an indication of the control which those leaders have upon the masses. If by adopting the amendment you virtually reject this great measure of relief, you increase the power of those southern demagogues.

Mr. Chairman, you do more than that; you diminish Unionism in the South; you deprive the Unionists of all argument; you solidify rebel sentiment; you intensify rebel feeling; the contrary will prevail if this bill should pass. No man doubts, Mr. Chairman, that this rebellion was only made possible by the ignorance of the great mass of the people of the South, an ignorance which still exists among them. You must seek to raise up the standard of the southern people. You must, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has well said, send education and charity hand in hand to these people. You must reach the minds of these men by first reaching their hearts, and in no better way can you satisfy them than by this measure, that the people of the North are not the enemies of the people of the South; that we still recognize the ties of citizenship which once bound us to them, that we still recognize the ties of humanity which should unite us to them and to all the people of the world.

Mr. MILLER. I modify my amendment so that it shall provide for the expending of this money by the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move that the committee rise so that we may adjourn. We have heard a most interesting debate on this subject, and there are, no doubt, other gentlemen who would like to be heard on this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House joint resolution No. 6, placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounty; and Senate joint resolution No. 1, presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, the first with and the latter without amendment.

He also reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States; and had come to no resolution thereon.

BOUNTY TO MISSOURI TROOPS.

The first business reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was House joint resolution No. 6, placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounty.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was concurred in.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCLURG moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO GEORGE PEABODY.

The House next took up Senate joint resolution No. 1, presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 60) to change the name of the steamship Paonsun, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved that the Niagara ship-canal bill reported from the select committee be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal to the gentleman to let me move to go into committee, so that we may report back the pending resolution for the relief of the destitute in the South and Southwest, in order that it may be considered and acted on to-morrow morning. It will delay us not a moment, and the joint resolution will be open to debate in the House as well as in committee.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. DONNELLY: The memorial of the Historical Society of the State of Minnesota, asking for such a change in the postal laws as would permit the postage upon books and pamphlets sent to historical societies and library companies to be paid upon delivery of the same.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Spurrier, guardian and representative of the children of the late Surgeon Henry L. Heiskell, United States Army, praying the passage of an act authorizing the Paymaster General to pay to them the difference of pay, including commutation, which the said Surgeon Heiskell received while acting as Surgeon General of the Army, and that of the pay of Surgeon General United States Army, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 50) for the relief of William M. Kimball, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of the Commercial Navigation Company of the State of New York, praying for aid in the establishment of a regular line of steamships, sailing under the flag of the United States and owned by American citizens, for the conveyance of the foreign mails of the United States between New York and Bremen, touching at Southampton, reported a bill (S. No. 62) to provide for an American line of mail steamships to run between New York and one or more European ports; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 19) declaring a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near the town of St. Charles and a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi river at or near the city of Louisiana, in the State of Missouri, to be legal structures and post roads, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Telegraph Company of New York the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe, via the Bermudas and Azore Islands, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) to prevent the sale or use of liquors in the Capitol building, reported adversely thereon, and in connection therewith reported the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the nineteenth Joint Rule be amended so as to read as follows:

No spirituous or malt liquors or wines shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto; and it shall be the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, under the supervision of the Presiding Officers thereof, respectively, to enforce the foregoing provisions; and any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate or connive at the violation of this rule shall be dismissed from office.

CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 54) to enlarge the public grounds surrounding the Capitol, to report in part. I will state that it is not expected that the bill referred to will pass both Houses at the present session, and the committee have concluded to recommend an appropriation of $20,000 under the advice of the architect, for the purpose of grading and filling and improving the public grounds. It is necessary to begin that work, and it will make a great saving if it is begun at once, besides saving time, and to appropriate a small sum for that purpose. There is another reason why action should be had. Owing to the recent act that we passed placing the public buildings and grounds under the direction of the chief Engineer of the Army, there is now a conflict of jurisdiction, and nobody knows exactly by whom the repairs and alterations are to be made. The second section of this bill is added therefore for the purpose of setting that right. It is a short bill and will be easily understood, and if there is no objection I should like to have it considered at the present time, as it is important to pass it at the present session.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 64) to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates the sum of $20,000, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, under the supervision of the architect of the Capitol extension, in grading, filling up, removing buildings, and improving the public grounds and streets around the Capitol. All the repairs and alterations of the Capitol building are to be made under the direction and supervision of the architect of the Capitol extension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouigny, was taken from the table, read a second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 63) to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Longisland, in Boston harbor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 65) granting the right of way over the public lands to the Pacific Coal Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 66) granting lands to aid in the construction of a canal in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 67) to expedite the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad and telegraph line; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 68) to create the office of surrogate of the District of Columbia, provide for the appointment, and define the powers and duties of guardians, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL CONTRACT WITH A SENATOR.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department of the United States of America; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is that?

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to hear that resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask to have it read at length in the first place, and then I shall ask the Senate to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read at length for information.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas it is declared by an act of Congress approved April 21, 1868, that no member of Congress shall directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, execute, hold, or enjoy in whole or in part any contract or agreement hereafter to be made or entered into with any officer of the United States, or to any benefit to arise therefrom, &c.; and whereas the present contractor for route No. 14782, from Lincoln, California, to Portland, Oregon, has recently been elected United States Senator: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c. That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to cancel the contract between the United States and the present contractor for the transportation of the mail on route No. 14782, between Lincoln, California, and Portland, Oregon, annulling the same in the usual way, to take effect on the 30th day of September, A. D. 1867; and it is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster General, after the passage of this act, to advertise for bids for the performance of the service for the residue of the contract term, for at least thirty days, in at least one newspaper published at the seat of government of the State of California, and one newspaper published in Portland, Oregon, and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there be no objection I will ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It relates to my colleague in the Senate here, and I will briefly state—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first ascertain whether the Senate will agree to consider the resolution. It requires unanimous consent to consider it at this time. The Chair hears no objection, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will briefly state that my colleague is the contractor upon that route. He took the contract about a year ago, I think. It is the route that extends from Lincoln, in California, to the city of Portland, in Oregon. Since that time he has been elected to the United States Senate; and as the law recited in the resolution provides that no member of Congress shall hold or enjoy any contract with the Government, he desires to have the contract canceled, and the route relet. I will add that since he took the contract a joint resolution has passed Congress providing for a mail route from San Francisco to Portland by sea, so that this route is relieved from the carriage of the paper and document mail; and I have no doubt, if this contract is annulled, it can be relet for a less sum than it was originally let to my colleague, and it will be a saving of expense to the United States. He is compelled to be here attending upon his duty as a member of the Senate, and of course is not able to supervise the management of this business. In addition to that, he feels a very great delicacy in holding a contract of that nature with the Government while he is a member of this body. For these reasons, and I believe it meets altogether with the approbation of the Post Office Department, he asks to have the contract canceled.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the honorable Senator if he has the law before him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask him to be so kind as to read it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The first section of the act of April 21, 1868, provides:

"No member of Congress shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in the whole or in part, any contract or agreement hereafter to be made or entered into with any officer of the United States in their behalf, or with any person authorized to make contracts on the part of the United States; and if any member of Congress shall, directly or indirectly, &c."

Mr. JOHNSON. I asked my friend to read the law because I supposed it was doubtful whether it would not apply exclusively to contracts entered into subsequent to the period when the party should become a member of Congress. The words seem to be more comprehensive, however, than I supposed them to be; and I rise for the purpose of saying to the honorable member and his colleague, that if the law is as it is understood to be by them, that it prohibits him from going on to execute a contract, that of itself annuls it, and it requires no legislation at all. He cannot be liable to perform a contract which it is illegal in him to hold and illegal in the Government to ask him to discharge. I should suppose that if the honorable member from Oregon, to whom the resolution refers, should make application to the Postmaster General, stating the fact that he was under no obligation, and a court would hold he was under no obligation, to perform the contract, the Postmaster General would at once do what this resolution proposes he shall do, that is, give the contract to somebody else. My principal objection to the resolution is that where the reasons of the honorable member from Oregon for offering the resolution are not understood, it may be considered as intended to censure him. That, I am sure, is not the design.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. It would be better, I think, therefore, that he should inform the Postmaster General that he is under a legal inability to discharge the contract and have it annulled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, the Postmaster General is doubtful as to his authority to annul this contract, unless the power is conferred by legislation. I believe there has been an opinion of the Attorney General to the effect that this law did not affect a contract made with a person who was afterward elected a member of Congress, and I presume the Postmaster General under that opinion is doubtful as to his power, and in order to remove all doubts on the subject, and to remove all responsibility from the Postmaster General in that respect, at the instance of my colleague, this joint resolution is offered. Of course, it will be taken as no reflection upon him. It is not so much because he has a legal right to be absolved from the performance of his contract, as it is because he is compelled to attend to his duties here, and so is unable to attend to his duties as contractor, and because he does not like to be placed in the position as a member of Congress of having a contract of this kind with the Post Office Department, as it may expose him to unfriendly criticism on the ground of being interested in a contract of that magnitude with the Post Office Department while he is a member of the Senate. It is upon these grounds, and not because he may not have a legal right to hold the contract if he should insist upon it, that he asks the passage of the resolution. I will simply say that I am quite confident that it will save expense to the United States to cancel the contract.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know there are many others who want the contract, and it has been relieved of considerable of its burden since it was made.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the honorable member from Oregon, who has this resolution in charge, inasmuch as this contract is a very heavy one, covering a line of six hundred miles, with a compensation of $179,000, that probably more time should be given for the advertisement than is provided in the resolution. It is but thirty days, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEY. The contract has three years to run; and a greater period than thirty days should be allowed for competition. I therefore suggest that it be enlarged to sixty days.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator so modify his resolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions inquire as to the propriety of providing by law that pensions granted by special act of Congress shall be placed on the same footing as to the amount to be paid as pensions granted under general laws.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution, to be referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That three thousand additional copies of the bankrupt law be ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I move to amend the resolution by inserting "five thousand" instead of "three thousand."

Mr. MORTON. I accept the modification. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the Senator aware that some extra copies have already been ordered and these will be in addition. Three thousand have been already ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I want the number to be five thousand instead of three thousand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing under the rules.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounty, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 33.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported an amendment in the form of a substitute for the bill. The substitute is the House bill very nearly, with a number of unimportant alterations and some that are perhaps somewhat important. We thought the proposition of the committee would be better understood by submitting as one amendment, and have therefore offered it in the form of a substitute so as to prevent confusion. I suggest that, unless some Senator desires to hear the original bill read, the substitute only need be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute alone will be read unless some Senator calls for the reading of the original bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the bill itself had better be read before the substitute is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as passed by the House of Representatives, and next the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert:

That before the 1st day of September, 1867, the commanding general in each district defined by an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, shall cause a registration to be made of the male citizens of the United States, twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish in the State or States included in his district, which registration shall include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid, and who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation: "I, _____, of _____, in the county or parish of _____, in the State of _____, do hereby solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am not excluded from the right to vote by the fifth and sixth sections of said act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States; that I will support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and that I will, to the best of my ability, encourage all others to do the same, so help me God;" which oath or affirmation may be administered by any registering officer.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That after the completion of the registration hereby provided for in any State, at such time and places therein as the commanding general shall appoint and direct, of which at least thirty days' public notice shall be given, an election shall be held of delegates to a convention for the purpose of establishing a constitution and civil government for such State loyal to the Union, said convention in each State, except Virginia, to consist of the same number of members as the most numerous branch of the State Legislature of such State in the year 1860, to be apportioned among the several districts, counties, or parishes of such State by the commanding general, giving to each representation in the ratio of voters registered as aforesaid as nearly as may be. The convention in Virginia shall consist of the same number of members as represented the territory now constituting Virginia in the most numerous branch of the Legislature of said State in the year 1860, to be apportioned as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the commanding general of each district shall appoint as many boards of registration as may be necessary, consisting of three loyal officers or persons, to make and complete the registration, superintend the election, and make return to him of the votes, lists of voters, and of the persons elected as delegates by a plurality of the votes cast at said election; and upon receiving said returns he shall open the same, ascertain the persons elected as delegates according to the returns of the officers who conducted said election, and make proclamation thereof, and within sixty days from the date of election he shall notify the delegates to assemble in convention at a time and place to be mentioned in the notification, and said convention, when organized, shall first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of such State to frame a constitution and civil government according to the provisions of this act and the act to which it is supplementary, and if so, shall proceed to frame such constitution; and when the same shall have been so framed, said constitution shall be submitted by the convention for ratification to the persons registered under the provisions of this act at an election to be conducted by the officers or persons appointed, or to be appointed, by the commanding general, as hereinbefore provided, and to be held after the expiration of thirty days from the date of notice thereof, to be given by said convention; and the returns thereof, shall be made to the commanding general of the district.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all elections in the States mentioned in the said act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, shall, during the operation of said act, be by ballot; and all officers making the said registration of voters and conducting said elections shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office."

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all expenses incurred by the several commanding generals, or by virtue of any orders issued, or appointments made, by them, under or by virtue of this act, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the convention for each State shall prescribe the fees, salary, and compensation to be paid to all delegates and other officers and agents herein authorized or necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act not herein otherwise provided for, and shall provide for the levy and collection of such taxes on the property in such State as may be necessary to pay the same.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the word article, in the sixth section of the act to which this is supplementary, shall be construed to mean section.

Mr. DRAKE. I suppose, Mr. President, that the matter which is subject to amendment at this time is the proposed substitute reported by the Judiciary Committee. Am I right in that supposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRAKE. I have several amendments which I wish to offer to that substitute. The first one I will present now. It is to insert after the second section of the substitute the following section:

And be it further enacted, That at said election the registered voters of each State shall vote for or against a convention to form a constitution therefor under this act. Those voting in favor of such a convention shall have written or printed on the ballots by which they vote for delegates as aforesaid the words "for a convention," and those voting against such a convention shall have written or printed on such ballots the words "against a convention." The persons appointed to superintend said election and make return of the votes given thereat, as herein-after provided, shall count and make return of the votes given for and against a convention; and the commanding general, to whom the same shall have been returned, shall ascertain and declare the total vote in each State for and against a convention. If a majority of the whole number of voters registered in any State as aforesaid shall have voted for a convention, then such a convention shall be held as hereinafter provided; and if a majority of such whole number of voters shall have voted against a convention, then no such convention shall be held under this act.

It will be seen, Mr. President, by reference to the third section of the substitute presented by the Judiciary Committee, in lines fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen, that it is provided that the convention—

When organized shall first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of such State to frame a constitution and civil government according to the provisions of this act and the act to which it is supplementary, and if so, they are to proceed to frame such constitution.

I think that is an unwise provision in this act. I do not think that the individuals elected as members of the convention should have it in their power to make an official expression of what they choose to consider or declare to be the wish of the people; but that the people themselves should by their votes declare their wishes on that subject. If there is any State there that does not wish to form a State government under this act, let the people of that State so declare by their own votes, and not by the voice of the delegates that they elect to a convention. If there is any State which does desire to form a State government under this act, let its people express their wish upon that subject by their own votes, and not by the voice of their delegates elected to the convention. In other words, Mr. President, I do not propose that this act or any other act of the Congress of the United States should put it in the power of any set of men to thwart or defeat the will of the people of any one of these States. I wish that the people of each State should have full freedom to do or not to do under this act. Therefore it is that if the expression of the wish of the people is to be had in reference to this matter, I desire it to be directly by the people, and not by the delegates elected in convention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri was considered in committee, not in the precise form in which he has presented it to the Senate, but the propriety of such a provision was considered by the committee, and for two reasons it was thought more advisable to adopt the mode provided by the committee to ascertain the wishes of the people.

The Senator from Missouri will remember that our Government is carried on by representatives. The people themselves govern through representatives in this country; and it is proposed that the delegates, who are elected by the people, shall determine whether it is the desire of the people to frame a constitution under this bill. The question will enter into the election of delegates, if there be a division of opinion, as to whether a constitution and State government shall be formed under the law; and they will elect delegates that are favorable or unfavorable to the formation of a constitution, and express their opinion in that way, and we shall thereby avoid the expense and trouble of having the vote at the time.

Moreover, this is in harmony with the legislation of Congress. This is the mode that is provided in our laws relative to the organization of governments in the new States. In the act providing for a State government in Minnesota it was declared that the delegates elected to a convention for that purpose should first determine whether the people of that Territory desired to form a State government in accordance with the law authorizing them to do so. It is always better to follow precedents which have worked well, rather than to adopt new modes of proceeding.

Then, as a complete and perfect answer to the objection suggested by the Senator from Missouri, that he does not desire the people of any State to form a constitution and State government under the provisions of this law unless it is their wish, I point him to the fact that the bill provides expressly that the constitution, when formed, shall be submitted to the people for ratification, and unless it is ratified, not by a majority of those who vote, but by a majority of all the registered voters in the State, it is to be of no effect whatever. There is the safety. The work itself, not the preliminary proceeding before the constitution is formed, but the work itself, when it is complete and perfect and submitted to the people, is to be passed upon by every registered voter; and unless a majority of all the registered voters, whether they all vote or not, go to the polls and say that they desire this constitution and form of government, it is not to be adopted. Can it, therefore, for a moment be pretended that a government is to be forced upon any State?

For the reasons which I have suggested, first, because this is in conformity to the usual legislation of Congress; second, because it accomplishes in the votes of the delegates themselves, when they assemble in convention, the object sought to be attained; and third, because the work when done is to be submitted to the people and passed upon directly by them, the committee were of opinion that it was better to adhere to the form of obtaining the expression of the people which they have adopted; and I wish to say now in the outset that although some members of the Senate might be of a different opinion, and although the Senator from Missouri might be of a different opinion, and think his form of obtaining the expression of the opinions of the people better—of course he did think so, or he would not have proposed the amendment—yet I submit to him, and I submit to the Senate, that unless something substantial is to be gained by the change, it will be better to adhere to the bill as reported by the committee, because when you commence changing a bill of this character on motions in the Senate there is danger of making it incongruous, involving the necessity of a reference and the consumption of much time. If the object of the bill is to be obtained substantially in the mode that the committee thought it best to adopt, I submit to Senators that it is better not to amend the bill in that respect, as it will occasion delay and accomplish nothing except in the form of proceeding.

Mr. DRAKE. I confess, Mr. President, my very great surprise at the opposition made by the Senator who has just taken his seat to this proposed amendment. I really supposed that if there were any one thing about which there could not be a difference of opinion it would be on just such a provision as this.

The gentleman seems to think that it is in every respect sufficient to put it into the hands of delegates elected to the conventions in these States to determine whether the people wish to form State governments under this act, and he refers to the familiar fact that ours is a Government carried on through representatives. Very true, sir; but here are States which are to form new constitutions, and the fundamental question and the first question with them is whether they will have any representatives at all to form constitutions. Undoubtedly after they shall have expressed themselves favorably upon that subject, the delegates whom they will have elected will proceed to the work; but what I wish to get at is that the people themselves shall make the expression, and not any delegates selected by them.

Do I need to tell the gentleman that the precedent which he cites in the case of Minnesota, where a State government was formed ten or fifteen years ago, is no precedent for these southern States in this day? In Minnesota it was expected, and could confidently be expected, that the delegates elected to their constitutional convention would faithfully reflect the will of the people as to the matter of forming a State government or not forming it.

But, sir, I need not tell that gentleman who has sat here so long in this Senate Chamber, and all through the period of the later rebellion, that in the States for which we are now proposing the means of forming constitutions there are men who will betray that people at any instant that it may subserve their own private interests to do so, and who might be elected as delegates to the convention with a pledge that they would go for the formation of a State government, and then under influences which might be brought to bear upon them turn round and defeat the will of the loyal people of those States. Sir, the history of the last six years in that southern region is but one continued history of treachery such as the world never saw, and now to put it in the power of a few men to trick and cheat and defraud the loyal people of those States out of loyal governments, by pretending to be in favor of the formation of State constitutions there, and getting themselves elected as delegates to do it, and then turning round and expressing the wish of the people not to do it, is what I intend to guard against if I can here. It is effectually guarded against by this proposed amendment. I do not intend that that people shall be betrayed if it is in my power to prevent such a result.

But the gentleman says that the people are to ratify the work of the convention. We are not dealing with that question at this stage of the bill. We are dealing in the first instance with the question whether there shall be a convention, whether the people want a convention. If they do not want a convention, why have it, and then have the work of the convention rejected by a majority that do not want any State government under this bill? Let us begin at the foundation; let the proceedings in the several States start with the very fundamental principle that the people shall govern in taking the first step. Do not leave the people afterward to the necessity of utterly rejecting all that has been done, when, if they could have expressed themselves in the first place, they would not have allowed it to be done.

The gentleman says that unless there is something substantial in the difference between a proposed amendment and the substitute offered by the Judiciary Committee the Senate ought not to adopt it. Sir, I am surprised that a gentleman of his acute mind and great learning should perceive no substantial difference here between the people by their direct voice expressing themselves on this subject, and their delegates, elected under fraudulent pretenses perhaps, undertaking to express the will of the people for them, and expressing it as it is not. I see a substantial and very wide difference, and I trust the Senate will concur with me in perceiving that difference, too.

The gentleman talks about the expense. What expense is it, when they go there to elect their delegates, to write or print on the same ticket the words required by this proposed amendment? The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] inquires of me what are the words. Those who are in favor of a convention are to have written or printed upon the ballots by which they vote for delegates the words "for a convention;" and those who are opposed to a convention are on their ballots to have written or printed the words "against a convention." The very hand that deposits a ballot in the ballot-box for the purpose of electing delegates deposits also the expression of the will of the voter as to whether those delegates shall ever assemble or not. I trust that on no account, then, will the Senate consent to allow the elected delegates in any State to undertake to express the wish of the people on this fundamental question; but that the Senate will give the people themselves the opportunity to express that wish by their separate and individual ballots.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I wish simply to say that this question has been before the people of Nebraska two or three times over. When we first voted on the question of a constitutional convention I remember that we elected delegates to the convention and voted "no" at the same time as to forming a constitution. Consequently the convention did not meet to form a constitution. Again, at another time we voted for delegates, elected delegates, and some of those delegates met, but before they were all in their places an adjournment was moved and carried; and the convention adjourned without forming a constitution for Nebraska. As this point has been presented by the Senator from Missouri, I am inclined from our own experience to vote for a proposition which will allow the people to say whether they will have a State government or not at the time when they elect their delegates.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska what was accomplished by that in Nebraska. He says that after the people had voted that they would have a convention the delegates did not form a constitution, but adjourned. So it seems you have got to leave it to the delegates at last. The fact that the people voted for a constitution, if the delegates were opposed to it, in Nebraska, it seems resulted in the delegates not forming a constitution. What, then, was accomplished by the popular vote? The same result followed the vote both ways. The people first voted that they would not have a convention, and then it did not meet. The second time they voted that they would have a convention, and then it met and adjourned without forming a constitution. The instance cited shows the inutility of the very measure that is offered.

Mr. TIPTON. I hold that in the first instance in voting upon the question in Nebraska the delegates obeyed the instructions of the people; but it costs nothing more, and it is just as easy to bring them under these instructions through the ballot-box as to the formation of a constitution as it is to elect the delegates themselves, and I prefer that both questions go together.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not see that the amendment is essential. The people of each State must trust the delegates to form and frame the constitution. That is the material duty which is to be performed. That has to be placed in the hands of the delegates. I hold the security to be in this: that no constitution can be adopted unless it receives on the vote for its ratification a majority of all the votes registered; not a majority of the votes cast merely, but a majority of all the votes registered in the State; so that a constitution cannot be imposed upon a people against their will; and that gives the people every possible protection.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we may have the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. DRAKE. I will say one word more. The Judiciary Committee in the proposed substitute start out with the idea of having an expression of the wish of the people. That is the language of the bill, that the delegates "shall first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people" to form such a constitution. Now, sir, the very point is whether the mode prescribed by the committee for ascertaining the wish of the people shall be the one adopted by the Senate, or whether that mode which enables the people themselves to say what their wish is shall be the one adopted. I concur in the demand of the Senator from Massachusetts for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

Mr. HOWARD: I think well of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Missouri, and hope it will be adopted. The anomalous state of things which exists in the rebel States, and the little knowledge which the great mass of the people there possess probably of their real situation and relations to the Government of the United States, it seems to me make it necessary that we should do all in our power to acquaint them with that situation, and to enlighten their minds as to what it may be proper and expedient for them to do. I am pleased with the idea that these governments, when established, shall originate with the people, and receive the sanction of the people themselves; and I concur in the main with what has been said by the honorable Senator from Missouri as to the propriety of the step which he proposes.

The bill which we recently passed holds out to the people of the rebel States a proposition, that upon complying with certain terms which we have prescribed in that act they shall be rehabilitated and readmitted to the full enjoyment of their rights as States of the Union. The fifth section of the act declares—

That when the people of any one of said rebel States shall have formed a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects, framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said State, twenty-one years old and upward, &c.—

and have complied with certain other terms, they shall be entitled to readmission. Now, I think we ought, so far as it is practicable for us, as I said before, to bring home to the knowledge of all the people of the rebel States the proposal which we have made to them, so that they may clearly understand it. And what step is it possible for us to take more accordant with our duties in that regard than the simple question put to them, "Will you form a State government according to the acts of Congress? Are you willing to accept of these terms?" Of course this question will give rise to discussion among them all, both white and black, and it will render it more difficult that they should hereafter be imposed upon by demagogues and perfidious persons, who are really not in the interest of the mass of the Union people of the South, than it otherwise would be; and although this is by no means the only measure I would adopt in regard to the preliminary steps, still I receive it with acceptance and shall vote for it, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I like the proposition of the honorable Senator from Missouri very well, and have no objection to vote for it if I cannot get anything which satisfies me better, regarding it as an improvement of the bill as it stands. But, sir, perhaps the views which I entertain with regard to what ought to be done differ very essentially from those of what may be a considerable majority of the Senate, and I will state them, although I do not propose at present to move any amendment to the bill, preferring to wait until I see what is to be the fate of the proposition made by the Senator from Missouri.

We have proposed to the people of these States that in case they desire to return to the Union they can do so upon complying with certain propositions which we have made to them. This was done in part with the object of affording facilities to them to return if they desired, and putting an end to the common remark, made by those who perhaps do not always believe it themselves, that the object of the Union party is to prevent the reestablishment of these States as States of the Union.

But, sir, there is one thing which I think was omitted, or which might have been more specifically provided for in that proposition, and which this bill does endeavor to provide for, and that is, to make it secure that all the people who under that proposition have a right to vote shall be so provided for as to their right that they can execute it freely and understandingly. It is with that view, as I understand, that this proposition is made, that the commanding general in each of these States shall make a registration of voters as a preliminary step to any action; and that after having made a registration of voters he shall take such steps as shall secure the free exercise of the right of voting to all who are entitled to vote. That is very well; and not only very well, but very essential. I agree to that so far as it goes; but it does not strike me favorably. I confess that we should go further and make it the duty of the commanding general to call a convention. I do not think it is a part of our business to say that a convention shall be called. We leave it, or pretend to leave it, to the people to decide that question.

What was our complaint of the President? That he sent Governors into those States and under military direction provided for the reestablishment of the States themselves. Many of us denounced that as a usurpation on the part of the President, and said that he was thrusting upon the people of these States an establishment of government which they perhaps did not call for. Now, sir, do we not propose by this bill to do the same thing; to send our general there, ostensibly under the provisions of the act, to take care of the people, to protect all of them, and see that their rights are not invaded? But by this bill we go further, and say it shall be his duty, not only to register the voters and see that they all exercise their rights freely, but to call a convention and to take control of the whole thing without asking the people whether they desire it or not. I do not wish to expose myself to the chance of that accusation.

Again, sir, it has been a common complaint, and a complaint coming from precisely the people who are in control of these governments, that we desire to keep them out of the Union, that they wish to get the States back, and that the Union party in Congress and out of Congress desire to prevent their return. We do not avoid that by insisting that we shall take the control of their organization, that we shall force them back, that we shall settle the question how they are to come back and when they are to come back, that we shall appoint a convention for them, for we do it when we put it into the control of the general. I want the expression to come from these very people themselves, a free expression on the question, "Do you desire to come back into the Union; what is your wish; if it is your wish express it;" and I should like that expression to come from these very provisional governments. They were governments elected by the people in a certain way. We have recognized their legal existence as governments in these States. We have said in the very act that we passed at the last session that they are provisional governments. We have established that fact. It is no longer in our mouths to deny, in any shape or form, that they are legal provisional governments in these States after we have made them so—not legal State governments; that we deny; but legal provisional governments. We have legalized them.

Now, sir, let me state what my mode of action would be. I do not want them to be at liberty to say in consequence of our action afterward they did not want to come back, that they did not mean to come back, that they preferred to be independent, that they wished to have nothing to do with us, or that they desired to keep out and have as little to do with us as possible, as they may say if we take this course of proceeding. I do not want to have that lie in their mouths, that they wished to continue independent, but were not only invited back, but forced back by our action. Therefore, sir, my mode would be in this matter to provide that before any action whatever upon the subject of a convention to form a State constitution and establish a State government there should be the registration that is provided for by this bill, complete and thorough, and that when that registration was perfected a copy of it should be placed in the hands of the provisional government of the State, which we have recognized as provisional government; and then when the provisional government, elected by the people of a State, by solemn act should express their desire for a convention of the people to frame a State constitution and a State government, the commanding general should proceed as directed by this bill, and take steps to see that a convention was called and that it was properly guarded, and that everybody had a right to vote, and then adopt if you please all the other provisions of this bill.

Indeed, I do not know what right we have now to ignore these governments as provisional governments of the States. We have established them, as I said before, we have recognized them, we have made them legal. Have they no functions to perform? Would it not be a very proper function for them to say whether they desired a convention or not? Then the expression of that desire would come from the very people from whom I want the expression of the wish to come, in order that they may not have an opportunity to taunt us hereafter and say that we have been forcing them to do what they did not desire to do. I would give them the opportunity for a free expression of opinion. I think that is the proper mode. I would guard all the details carefully; but as to the expression itself, I say let it come from the very men from whom we wish to hear, and who are the representatives of the people of the several States so far as an election could make them so, and so far as our act in legalizing them as provisional governments can establish that they are so.

I would prefer that. I do not know any other Senators who agree with me or with my reasoning, but it addressed itself to my mind as what ought to be done and what would be perfectly consistent with our own action heretofore and with what we desire to accomplish. I say now, sir, as I have often said on this floor, that while I desire, strongly desire, that the whole United States may be gathered together in one Union as soon as possible, going on harmoniously, I do not want to take the control of these people or force them back into the Union against their will, before they wish to come. I have not that degree of anxiety on the subject, because if we do that we shall have a very unhappy and disunited family after they come back; nor, as I have before remarked, do I wish them to have a pretense for saying that this matter has been forced upon them, any portion of them, a majority of them, rebel or otherwise, before they were desirous of reuniting themselves with us.

I do not deem it particularly important where the expression of a desire for a convention comes from, so that it is a fair expression of the popular will. If a convention was proposed by the Legislature of a provisional government, and then called by the commanding general under the limitations which this bill provides, the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Missouri might very well come in as an addition, and let the people, after the convention was called, and when they came to vote, decide whether they, the people, wanted one in accord with the wish that had been expressed by the provisional government, and then it would be a perfect expression all around.

Now, sir, I shall not oppose particularly what the majority desire to do. I am ready to vote for this bill in some shape. I apprehend that it cannot be put into a shape so objectionable that I will not vote for it with the majority of my friends on this floor; but I confess I should like it much better if the expression of the popular will in these States were provided for in the mode I have pointed out.

We have done all for our friends in the South who are particularly alluded to, the minority of whites there—whether our friends, counting whites and blacks, be a majority or not, I do not know, and it cannot now be ascertained—we have provided for their safety in the most efficient way by providing military protection. And if we go further, and provide for the full execution of their own will at the ballot-box in relation to these questions, I do not see that we lose anything by having the conventions called by the properly-constituted authorities, those that we have now said are legal authorities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the amendment to the amendment a call has been made for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It seems to me there is a practical difficulty in the way of the adoption of this amendment. It says that if a majority of the whole number of voters registered vote for a convention then a convention shall be held; but if a majority of the whole number of voters registered vote against it, it shall not be held. Now, it may happen that an election may be held when there will not be a majority of all the voters registered voting either for or against a convention. "What is to be done in that case? It seems to me certainly that the majority of the votes cast at the election should decide. If men who are registered as voters do not attend the polls at an election they are presumed to give their assent to the result, whichever way it is determined by those who do vote. If they stay away they consent to let the other voters determine the question. It strikes me the amendment is imperfect in that particular.

Mr. HOWARD. The object of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Missouri is to my mind quite plain. It is laying the foundation of a proceeding to establish a legal government in a State for the government of all; and the question which he submits in his amendment to the registered voters is whether they will or will not agree to have a legal State government as provided by law. Now, upon so solemn a question as that it does seem to me that a majority of all the freemen to be affected by the government ought to vote for its establishment before it ought to be established. It is not like an ordinary election of a candidate to the Legislature or to Congress, in which a majority or a plurality of the persons voting decide the issue; but it is a great political question, fundamental in its character, whether or not this people will form and be governed by a republican government according to the Constitution of the United States, and come again into the Union as constituent members of the Union. I trust, therefore, there will be no amendment in this respect made to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MORTON. For one, Mr. President, I am opposed to submitting the question of convention or no convention to the people of the rebel States in the beginning. I think the proposition now offered as an amendment is at variance with this whole movement of reconstruction. We have just provided a military government for these people for the protection of all of us to hasten the work of reconstruction. It must not, if possible, be allowed to be procrastinated. It seems to me that we are softening down very much when, after having provided a military government for these people, we are now so sensitive about having a convention unless a majority of all the voters in a State shall first vote in favor of it. I am not in favor of submitting that question in the beginning. If two thirds of the lawful voters of a State in the South are not in favor of a convention, I am not for giving them the power to defeat a convention. Let them stay away from the polls; but let them not thereby be able to defeat a convention, and thus defeat the work of reconstruction and prevent it from going forward. Let the first election be held simply for the purpose of electing delegates to the convention, and if two thirds of the people of those States choose to stand off upon their dignity or upon a hatred of this Government and refuse to take part in it, do not let it be in their power to defeat the work of the convention and prevent its being held. Let that go forward; let discussion go on; let the convention be held and the constitution formed. It is quite enough to give them the right to vote the constitution down at the last moment. Their rights are preserved by the final vote upon the ratification or non-ratification of the constitution.

We have established a military government for these States. It is not to the interest of this Republic to have that government continued one day longer than is necessary. We propose now to provide the machinery by which the people can go forward in the work of reconstruction. If the rebels down there say they will not have anything to do with it, although their names are registered by the commanding general under the terms of this amendment, they have but to stay away from the polls and the work is defeated. I would not submit that question at all. I would not even give them the power to vote it down directly in the beginning. Let us simply have the election of delegates; let us have the convention; let us have a constitution formed by the convention; and then it is enough, and it is all that they can require, all that is necessary to give all the people a right to vote the constitution down at the last moment. They might perhaps refuse to hold a convention; and yet if it was held, and a constitution formed, they would be very likely to ratify the constitution itself. It would have gone so far that they would not feel like going back and throwing everything into chaos again and continuing this military government; but now, when the military government has just commenced, and before they have felt the force of it, to give them the opportunity of voting down a convention altogether, it seems to me is impolitic and is at variance with the object which we have in view.

This supplemental bill is to provide the machinery of reorganization. It was very properly thought that what was everybody's business was nobody's business; it must be placed in the power of somebody to begin this work, somebody to go forward in it. We want to hasten it. The country cannot afford to have it procrastinated, to have it linger on from year to year. The condition of things down there is abnormal. We must hasten to make it normal, to bring these States into harmonious relations with this Government as soon as it can be done consistently with liberty, with safety to all, and with equal rights to all. I say that I would not give to the people, nor would I submit even to the convention as provided for by the committee, the question whether they will form a constitution. Let it be understood that there is to be a convention, that there is to be a constitution formed, and let it be formed and submitted to the people; and their right is reserved at the very last to vote it down if, upon their final judgment, after discussion, after full consideration, they deem it to be inimical to their interests.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it is doubtless desirable that the rebel States should at the proper time be readmitted into the Union. No one denies this. The Government of the United States at the present time holds them, as I have often said, by virtue of conquest, by force of arms, subject to the Government of the United States in all respects as conquered communities, a light in which only they can be viewed. We hold them, however, as I have before said, in a fiduciary relation: we hold them in trust to be restored to their original rights as States at such time and in such manner as we, the Congress of the United States, may see fit, having in view the good of the whole people and the tranquillity of the nation. I am not in such hot haste to discharge and perform this trust as to induce me to vote for the readmission of rebel States into Congress while there is a majority of the people of those States opposed to the connection. I will never agree to make an attempt to establish republican government in any State of this Union or in any Territory of the Union based upon the votes of a minority of the population. Give us a free and clear expression of a majority of the population, whose will is law in all republican governments, and do not attempt to set up governments and call them republican in the maintenance and support of which there is not to be found the voice of a majority. Sir, a minority government in this country cannot subsist. A government by a minority is inconsistent with the very spirit and genius of American politics and American government. If, therefore, there be not a majority of the voting population of any one of these rebel States in favor of coming back and taking their position as a State in the Union, I am for keeping them out until doomsday, or until at least they see the error of their ways and repent in dust and ashes for the wrong which they are doing to their own people and to the people of the United States. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] would have us force governments upon these communities. He would allow a minority in these States to set about the work of reconstruction and the formation of new constitutions for them. I will not do it consciously, unless I am satisfied that it is the will of a majority of the people of each of these States.

Now, sir, according to the scheme which that Senator suggests, the commander of the district by means of his military order perfects a registration, orders an election to be held in each State, and the persons registered who vote may constitute a small minority of the whole people; but that minority proceeds to form a constitution, and the delegates forming the constitution may be, and in some instances doubtless will be, the representatives of a mere minority of the people; and after the constitution has been formed, it is to be submitted, by the bill which we passed at the last session, for the ratification of such persons as happen to be registered within the limits of the State; and it then proceeds to declare that if the constitution shall receive the vote of a majority, not of the persons registered, but of those actually voting upon that question, it shall become the constitution of the State.

Mr. STEWART. No, sir; a majority of the persons registered. That is the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. "And when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification," is the language of the statute. A majority of the persons voting, not a majority of the persons registered.

Mr. PRELINGHUYSEN. The language of this bill is, a majority of the persons registered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the amendment of the Senate committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I am talking about the statute. I read from the act itself which we passed a few days ago, not this bill before us which is a departure, so far as that is concerned, from the act which we passed, and not in conformity with it. The proposition which we have made is, that if this Constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting upon the question of ratification it shall become the constitution of the State. That is the proposition which we have held out to them thus far. I do not propose to change the statute in that respect. I prefer infinitely to take the sense of the people of each one of these States as a preliminary step whether they are or are not willing to comply with these propositions which we have honestly made them, and thus come back into the Union in the manner prescribed by us; and I know of no form which is more just and better calculated to satisfy the necessities of the case than that which is contained in the amendment of the honorable Senator from Missouri. I hope, therefore, it will be adopted. Let us begin this work at the beginning, commencing at the foundation, and consult this once disloyal people and get from them a distinct and clear answer whether upon the terms which we have offered they are willing to reconstruct their governments and return to the enjoyment of the rights of sovereign States of this Union under the Constitution. If they are willing, that is, if a majority of them are willing, and if they comply with all the terms we have proposed, then, sir, I, for one, can no longer hesitate in admitting them back into the Union; but until this compliance has been made strictly, fairly, and honestly on the part of the rebel States I will never consent to admit them back into the Union.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that this amendment is necessary. I do not think the fears that are entertained by gentlemen are well founded. In the first place, the Senator from Maine claims that we have no authority to provide for calling a convention by the military authorities from the fact that we have recognized the provisional governments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not claim that we had no authority. I only claimed that I did not think it was wise to do it.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think we are committed at all so far as that bill is concerned. The sixth section of that bill provides for precisely such legislation as this, and if we had authority to pass that bill we certainly are acting in perfect harmony in continuing to legislate on the same subject as herein provided. That section reserves the power of Congress to modify these provisional governments, to abolish them, or to do whatever it pleases with them; so that this bill is in entire conformity and in the spirit of the original bill, and there can be no objection to it on that score.

This bill supplies a defect which all admit ought to be supplied, the machinery and the protection whereby the voice of the people can be fairly heard. It first provides for a registration in a careful and fair manner. It then provides for the election of delegates. It is not proposed that at the time the question of electing delegates is submitted to the people we shall also submit the question of whether or not they will form a constitution, whether they will have a convention at all or not. It seems to me that that is unnecessary; that so early in the discussion of this question the people will be ill prepared to pass upon that question. Let the convention meet; let it be discussed; let there be discussion in the South so that the people can understand the question. The mode of electing the delegates is fair. All the people are to have a right to participate in it. They can elect delegates opposed to a convention if they choose to do so, because in this bill we have provided that when the convention meets it may dissolve by a vote of its own body; so that that issue can be raised on the delegates sent to the convention; that issue can be kept before the people until the convention meets; that issue can be determined by the delegates after they assemble.

We inserted that provision for the purpose of meeting the views of those who desired that there should be an expression of the people as to the propriety of holding the convention. We thought that on the first vote they might not perhaps be properly informed as to whether they would desire a convention or not; but they can make the issue on the election of their delegates. The delegates, when they have assembled, will have learned the disposition of the people, and then they can dissolve the convention and end the whole proceedings; so that it is no snap judgment forced upon the people. Upon these questions they can all be heard. After the formation of the constitution it is submitted, not to a majority of the voters who vote at the election, but a majority of the voters who are registered; so that we must have an overwhelming sentiment in the South in favor of the constitution which shall have been formed or it can be defeated then.

There are many who are opposed to this provision. They say it places it in the hands of the rebels, although they may be a minority, by keeping away from the polls to defeat the wish of the majority, because it is almost impossible to get out a full vote upon the question of adopting a constitution. There will not be individual candidates running throughout the South at that time for the purpose of getting their friends out to vote for them. It is a well-ascertained fact that when a constitution is submitted alone, and there is no general election, the vote is always very light. Before this constitution can be ratified under the amendment proposed by the committee there must be at least two thirds of the people of the South in favor of it. From the facilities for keeping them from the polls, the disinclination to go to the polls upon a question of the adoption or rejection of a constitution, there being no persons interested to bring the voters to the polls, I say, practically, from my experience in seeing constitutions submitted in the Territories, it will take two thirds of the people of the South to be in favor of it, and warmly in favor of it, to get a majority of all the voters to the polls and get a vote that will ratify the constitution that is then submitted. So that there is no undue haste about this matter. The people are consulted at every step, and it is impossible that they should be dragged in here against their will by this bill. It is in the power of the rebels themselves, if they want to do so, to stay out under this bill.

Mr. President, the rebels have got power enough now; they have as much power as I propose to intrust to them, to prevent the South being represented here, to prevent the loyal people from having representation in Congress. They have a good deal of motive to do it under this bill, for many of them are disfranchised and excluded from office. They have enough motive and enough power to keep the South from representation in Congress. I do not wish to place any more clogs upon this machinery. I fully concur with the Senator from Indiana. He expressed my views exactly upon the question. It is time that we allowed an expression of the loyal people in the South. It is time that we gave them an opportunity to struggle to come back here and be represented. In that struggle I predict that they will develop a loyal element that will help to sustain this Government. Give them the chance to vote on both sides. Keep the political questions before them. Let them divide from interest or principle as they choose. Whenever the South has two parties the rebellion is ended, and not till then. Whenever you can have two parties, whenever you can have a division of sentiment in the South, then the South will govern itself. If you place it in the hands of the rebels to keep all the people in the same situation that they are; if you place it beyond a peradventure in the power of those whom you have disfranchised by this bill to keep the loyal men in their situation, to keep the loyal men disfranchised, as many of them will have an inclination to do, you have but one party there, and that is a party opposed to your Government. Give those who desire to return a fair opportunity.

I do not contend for giving a minority who desire to come in here such an opportunity that it shall be unfair, that they will be in here against the will of the people. I am opposed to that. I do not believe in minority governments; but under this bill there is no possibility of a minority government. In the final action there must not only be a majority, but any man who is acquainted with the practical operation of the provision which submits the constitution to a majority of all the registered voters, knows that practically it will take two thirds or three fourths of the people to ratify that government.

Then, I say, remove from Congress this discussion, and let them have discussion in the South; but if you place it entirely within the power of the disfranchised rebels to veto your action, your whole reconstruction policy will be abortive.

Mr. President, I think it is important for this country that the Union should be restored. I think it is important for the Union party, which has saved this country and carried on this war, that it shall accomplish this great work, and accomplish it on the great principles of justice and humanity; that it shall protect the rights of all; that it shall make every man equal before the law; that it shall make loyalty honorable and disloyalty odious. I believe that it is the work of the Union party. I believe that the Union party, the predominant party in Congress, has been for the last six weeks working exactly in the right direction. I believe that this bill will consummate the work, and that it will be seen that the great party which could raise armies and subdue this gigantic rebellion could protect its friends in the South when the war closed, could restore the Union on the principles of justice, could make all men free and equal throughout this broad land. I am glad to see Congress coming up to the work and stating frankly and squarely its purposes. I am glad to see it meet the issues, and meet them squarely.

Sir, we dare not delay this work. We have no security against ourselves. We have to be our own security that we will remain of the same mind, and that we will love human rights as we now do. We, I say, have to be our own security while we leave this work unaccomplished. A financial crash may come upon us. Troubles of other sorts, complications of various kinds may arise. If this great work is not accomplished it may happen that the rebels who will have the power under your proposed amendments to obstruct this bill and prevent its going into operation, to obstruct reconstruction, may, in the turn of human events, accomplish their purposes. We may be in no condition to protect our friends. The country has indorsed this measure. It accomplishes all that I have heard claimed from any source. I have heard no demands from any source beyond these. There have been suggestions, but there has been no action of Congress demanding more. I am opposed to putting in this bill anything that shall tend merely to delay, because when everything is ready, fit to be done, the quicker it is done the better.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree entirely with the honorable member from Indiana that it is our duty, and the duty of the people of the States who are now excluded from representation, to bring them back as soon as possible. The Government, according to my understanding of it, cannot subsist long with States out of the Union. It is a Government of States; and the theory upon which it rests is that the States are as important to the Government of the Union as that Government is important to the people and to the States. We may have a sickly existence, and for a time apparently a healthful existence, with ten States of the Union in the condition in which ten of the States now are; but to my mind it is perfectly certain that unless that state of things is changed, and changed soon, we shall be involved in serious trouble. Our finances will suffer from the effect of that condition most deleteriously. The credit of the nation, too, as a nation, not only financially, but otherwise, will be very much impaired.

I hold (and in that opinion I have concurred with the majority of the Senate, and I believe with the entire Senate as it is now composed) that there did not exist in the States of the Union any authority by which they could legally escape from the Union; that the attempt to escape, therefore, was of itself illegal, and imposed upon us the duty of arresting and defeating it, not for the mere purpose of arresting and defeating an insurrection, but for the purpose of restoring the Union. We have arrested, we have defeated it; and yet the Union is not what the Union was. Ten States are now not represented; and the only question for us to decide is whether it is not our duty, in some form or other, and at the earliest practicable moment, to bring them back, that this may be what our fathers intended it, a government of States.

The authority to acquire territory, (which was at one time doubted by some of the best men of the former age,) even with those who held that the authority existed and with those who hold it now, was not supposed to be an authority granted to us for the purpose of retaining the people in any such territory in a territorial condition. It was stated, and we have acted upon that theory, that the people of any territory acquired were to become States at as early a period as was consistent with the condition and rights of the States already in the Union. We were but guardians, in the sense of the Constitution as originally understood, for the people of those territories and bound at the earliest moment consistent with the safety of the other States and the rights of the other States to introduce them among us as States at the earliest moment.

Now, Mr. President, the amendment suggested by the honorable member from Missouri assumes as possible, and the honorable member from Maine supposes that it may be possible, that there is a majority in each one of those States or in some one of the States inimical to a restoration of their particular State into the Union. That, in my judgment, is a hostility if it exists, which should also be defeated. It is but another mode of accomplishing one of the designs which they had in inaugurating the rebellion, to escape from their obligation as States and as citizens of such States. If, therefore, there is a majority (assuming it now to be true for the sake of the argument) of the people of any one of these States unwilling to come into the Union, and there be any portion of the people willing to come in, I would leave it to that portion and force the majority to be with us again and to be governed as the people of States, and to be responsible to the government of their States.

The honorable member from Michigan has told us that no Government founded upon the will of a minority of the people can be republican. I have no doubt the honorable member is sincere in that view. Does he not consider those who took a leading part or an instrumental part in the rebellion as people of the States; and if he does, and he supposes that no government can be republican which does not consult in the first instance the will of all, why is it that he voted to exclude a large portion of the people of those States from the exercise of the right of franchise?

Mr. HOWARD. Because they are public enemies.

Mr. JOHNSON. Public enemies; but they are people. But I have another reason for wishing to force them in. Even supposing that there were not financial reasons in the ordinary sense of the term, or reasons of State, I am exceedingly unwilling to govern these States by military rule. What is it to cost in money? In addition to its cost in money what is it not to cost in the sacrifice of the principles of freedom and of liberty upon which our institutions rest? These people may become attached to military rule; the people of the United States may believe that it is the best mode of governing the South, and finally come to the conclusion that it is the best mode of governing the entire North; and then for the republican institutions founded upon freedom, which our fathers fought to establish and established, we may have substituted a military Government. In my view, Mr. President, that is the hazard that we dare not (speaking politically) run.

It is supposed that the amendment suggested by the committee requires for the adoption of the constitution which the convention may frame a majority of all the registered votes. I do not so understand it. But if it be capable of that interpretation it is a very easy thing in that particular to amend it. I understand it now as I understood it in committee, as containing no such provision. If it is to be found anywhere, it is in the fourth section of the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee. The words of that section are:

That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors registered—

That is to say, as I understand it, of those registered voting; and it is not therefore obnoxious to the criticism to which it is subjected by my friend from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, I was speaking in reference to the reconstruction act which we passed at the last session, and not in reference to the bill upon which he is now commenting.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is in conformity to it. I think the amendatory bill conforms in that particular to that act, as my friend will see, I think, upon comparing the two; but whether it be so or not, it is a very easy thing to amend it in that particular.

Mr. HOWARD. The act itself only requires a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand.

Mr. HOWARD. I was not speaking in reference to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the honorable member as saying that the bill departed from the original act in that particular.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly the bill does depart from it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not as amended, if I understand it aright; but in that respect it can be very easily set right.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that from the moment the original military bill was introduced up to the present time I believe the reflecting men of the South, those who participated in the rebellion as well as those who did not, those who are to be disfranchised as well as those who are not, have been, to a great extent, in favor of this measure. They are willing to live disfranchised if the people of their States are permitted to come in as citizens of the States and entitled to the exercise of the franchise, as provided for by the original bill and by this bill. Why not let them come in? The question answers itself, in my judgment. There is no reason in the world, there can be no reason plausibly assigned for keeping them out, except—and I am sure that reason does not influence any member of the Senate—a desire to keep them out.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll on the amendment of Mr. DRAKE.

Mr. BUCKALEW (when his name was called) said: I desire to say one word before I vote. I would very cheerfully vote for this amendment if it required the vote of a majority of the persons actually voting at the election. I vote "nay."

The result was then announced—yeas 17, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, and Wade—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Frothinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Edmunds, Guthrie, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Willey—9.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I shall offer an amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I stated when I got up that I had several amendments to offer, and if the Senator from Maine would allow me to offer one other at this time I would be much obliged to him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, sir.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to amend the fourth section of the substitute by adding at the end thereof:

Provided, That no such constitution shall be considered as entitling the State for which it is framed to such representation unless it provide that at all elections by the people for State, county, or municipal offices the electors shall vote by closed ballot, and that such mode of voting shall never be changed without the assent of Congress.

Mr. President, I have offered this amendment because of my knowledge from actual observation during a large portion of my life of the power which the minority of the people have exercised over the majority in some of the States of this Union through the viva voce system of voting; and I wish that that power should, if possible, by the action of this Congress be fully and finally broken in these States.

The substitute prepared by the Judiciary Committee provides that all elections held under this act shall be by ballot. The committee therefore recognize the importance of a fair and honest expression by that people, untrifled by the presence of those who have heretofore governed them, in the matter of the election held under this act. I wish to perpetuate that freedom to the people of these States. It is perfectly manifest to me that whenever these States are reconstructed the power is no longer to be in the hands of their aristocracy. The masses of the people, those upon whom the reproach has heretofore been cast of being the "poor white trash" of the South, combined with those who have heretofore been trampled down even below the "poor white trash" in the slavery to which they were subjected, these two classes are to be, until the infusion of a new life from the North into that region shall have taken place, the Governors of these rebel States; and the object of this amendment is that they shall be allowed to govern these States according to their free and unbiased will through all coming time as that will may be expressed through the closed ballot; that the elections by ballot shall not be held merely during the operation of this act, but that whenever their constitutions are formed there the principles shall be planted for the protection of those men forever hereafter; that no man is to stand at the polls in any of these States and frown down the will of the people, as has been done for long years past, but that every man shall forever on that soil have the full privilege of a freeman in voting just as his conscience and his judgment dictate.

If this measure be not adopted by the Senate, what will be the result? They will form their constitutions and they will perpetuate viva voce voting in every one of these States; and when you have got that perpetuated in their constitution, good bye to the will of the loyal people of these States; each one of them will still be governed, as it has been in all time past, by an aristocracy, the same aristocracy that struck at the Union, the same that got up the war which was its war, and dragged the poor man into it as the poor man's fight. I propose that those poor men shall speak the voice of that region. I propose that no more aristocracies shall lay down the law for the majority of that people. Sir, we cannot accomplish it in any other way than by guarding the right of the voter there in the closed ballot, and guarding it so that it shall never be taken away from him. If we do not, even supposing they form their constitutions now with the ballot system embodied in them, as soon as ever the eye of the General Government is taken off them, and its power over them has ceased, they will change that thing again, for they will find by the operation of the ballot system that the scepter of power has passed away from that aristocracy.

Therefore, sir, it is that I wish they should be informed beforehand, told in plain terms by the Congress of the United States, that they need send no constitution here which does not guaranty to every man on their soil a free and unrestricted vote in the closed ballot which he himself can deposit without scrutiny in the ballot-box that is to secure freedom—

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DRAKE. I will, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose these States, one or all, should adopt constitutions in which should be inserted a provision such as the Senator suggests, as strong as he could draw it; and after the admission of their representatives, on the next occasion of revising their constitutions, suppose they strike it out and substitute a provision ordaining viva voce voting; what is the Senator, or what are we going to do about it?

Mr. DRAKE. Is that the whole of the Senator's question?

Mr. CONKLING. I was going to ask another question, but I should like to have an answer to that.

Mr. DRAKE. If they form a constitution with a clause in it such as this amendment proposes, to wit, that they shall never do this thing without the consent of Congress, and they do it without the consent of Congress, then they have violated an express stipulation in the constitution that they formed and an express contract with this Government; and I, for one, would be prepared to say that they should not have Senators or Representatives in these Halls as long as that violation existed.

Mr. CONKLING. That is, the Senator would turn them out on that violation of this act?

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly, without a moment's hesitation.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. President, I have only to say, if the Senator will indulge me, that it would be rather an awkward thing to do in a good many respects; and it would be especially awkward in view of the fact that the Supreme Court has decided, I think repeatedly, certainly in one case that I well remember, which originated in Alabama, that any such compact would be utterly and absolutely void for all purposes.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not understand that the Supreme Court has ever decided any such thing as that; there can be no such contract valid between the General Government and a State government. I remember that such a compact was formed between the Congress of the United States and the State of Missouri when it came into the Union, and it has been regarded as binding upon both Congress and the State of Missouri from that day to this.

But, sir, is the point taken by the gentleman, that we might have difficulty in dealing with a violation of this compact between these States and the Union, any reason why we should not say to these States now, "If you come back, you have to come back under such a compact?" Sir, I hold that there is an obligation resting upon Congress here to protect the loyal people of these States by every means in our power, to the very last extremity. If Congress can see that it is a protection to the loyal people of these States in the future to require a particular mode of voting, I hold that there is just as much an obligation upon Congress to do that thing as there is to send its armies down there to protect the loyal people from the bayonet and the bullet of their oppressor. Sir, it is unnecessary, in my judgment, to the course of remark which I made that the gentleman should put this supposititious case in the future.

Mr. CONKLING. May I interrupt the Senator one moment again if I do not trespass? I inquire of the Senator whether in the case of the compact to which I understand he refers—I did not hear him perfectly—between his own State and the General Government it is not true that his State with impunity from that day to this has denied that compact and preserved upon its statute-book a statute in open defiance of it?

Mr. DRAKE. I am not aware of that fact. If the gentleman will specify what he refers to I may be able to answer him.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there not now, or was there not until very recently, I do not refer to recent legislative changes which I know have taken place there, but up to the time of the breaking out of the rebellion, was there not a statute in Missouri forbidding the entrance of free negroes into that State?

Mr. DRAKE. There was a statute passed, if my memory serves me, in 1847, which did not prohibit free negroes from coming into that State, but which declared that all who came into that State after a certain date should be reduced to slavery.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely.

Mr. DRAKE. It is one of those dark stains upon the escutcheon of Missouri which through the mercy of God and the rebellion we have wiped out forever.

Mr. CONKLING. The point however, Mr. President, which I wish to present is, that there is an instance cited on the other side, in which a State did with impunity for a long period of time and against all comers, nobody challenging the right in the regard of which we are now speaking, defy and set at naught by the severest and most odious provisions just such a fundamental compact as is contained in this amendment. It may have been very wrong, but there is the fact that she did it, and did it successfully.

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir; and why was it never inquired into by the judiciary of the country or by Congress? Simply because no case ever arose under the act, no attempt was ever made to reduce the colored people that came into that State after the designated day into slavery. Had it been done, then the power of the nation through Congress or through the judiciary would have been invoked to overthrow that iniquitous act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the honorable Senator from Missouri allow me to ask my friend from New York a question on the same point?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not object if the Senator from Missouri does not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator from New York, suppose there should be precisely such a provision adopted in the constitution of the State of Virginia, for example, with a proviso that it should not be changed without the assent of Congress, and the constitution should be accepted by Congress as it stood, that would form a compact to that extent undoubtedly; I presume the Senator will not deny that. Now, then, if Representatives should be elected under a change of the constitution without the assent of Congress, by viva voce vote, and should come here, and the House of Representatives should choose to say that that compact existing they were not legally elected and should not hold their seats, what could the Supreme Court do about it?

Mr. CONKLING. I should say that the Supreme Court could do nothing, and that Congress could do everything; that each House of Congress, acting alone, under the constitutional provision giving it a right to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, could repudiate such an election as that, and also that the repudiation would be competent on the ground suggested by the Senator from Maine, that it was at the instant a flagrant violation of one of the vital terms upon which alone Representatives were to be admitted. But that, I submit to the Senate, is as far as the East from the West from the proposition we are discussing here, which is to imbed in this bill a provision under which for all future time in undergoing the changes to which they may be subject these constitutions shall never cease to contain a provision prescribing a certain mode of voting. Now, I submit to him that these members, being once admitted, by the act of admitting them, as was said by a great publicist in regard to another matter, we have exercised a power, which gone for the moment is gone forever; and if they change their constitution after that, we could never turn them out any more than we can at present turn out the Senators from Oregon, for example, which is one of the States, I understand, now defying what is called a fundamental compact under which it came in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There might be some points where we should not have power to enforce it, but in the individual instance, either with regard to Senators or Representatives, the power to enforce that provision, that compact, if you please to call it so, is in the hands of the Senate and House of Representatives when acting upon the election of members of the respective Houses.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—

Mr. DRAKE. With all respect, I have given way to gentlemen long enough, I think.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend from Missouri allow me to ask my friend from New York a question just on that very point?

Mr. DRAKE. Will not the Senator from Massachusetts be so kind as to allow me to say the few words I have to say, and then he can ask the Senator from New York the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the gentleman from New York is evidently very complacent indeed with regard to his point. I judge, from the manner in which he put it and from the remarks which he made, that he thinks it is quite a clincher. But, sir, I have a word further to say about it. I answered him on the instant that if any State did such a thing as disregard the compact which this would impose, if it were adopted and put into the constitution, we would throw their Senators and Representatives out of these Halls. On further reflection I stand to it; and I do it upon the reason suggested by the honorable Senator from Maine, that if a State, after having formed its constitution and entered into this compact, should send up representatives here elected by a viva voce vote, in direct defiance of its own contract with this Government, we would thrust them out of the Halls of the representatives just as quickly as we would have done in times past representatives that had been elected by the slave population of those States in defiance of their constitutions. Then, suppose one of those States having this change made in its constitution of the system of voting, from the ballot to viva voce, should elect a Legislature by viva voce vote, and that Legislature should send Senators into this Hall, I say that the Senate would be justified in refusing seats on this floor to the men who were elected by that means, elected through a direct violation of the compact entered into between the State and the United States. And, sir, if ever such an occasion should come up in after years, mark the prediction: that if we have men here who have the nerve to do their duty, such Senators and Representatives would be turned away from this Capitol. There is the remedy for the case the gentleman from New York thinks he has so conclusively put to me.

But, sir, there is no danger of that thing. Once get the mode of voting by ballot fairly in the hands of a majority of the people down there, and they will be very likely to take care of it; but what I want is that while this nation is undertaking to reconstruct these States upon the principle of loyalty to the Union, upon the principle of protecting the loyal people, the work shall be done thoroughly. Sir, I come from a State where we have dealt with this rebellion in some of its foulest aspects; and we have learned there through a long and bitter experience that the only way to deal with it is to apply the knife, deep and strong down, to the very fibers of the roots, leave not a single atom in which to germinate a future rebellion. I come here, sir, I do not hesitate to avow in open Senate on the first occasion when I have undertaken to address this august body, that I come here as a representative, not of a conservative radicalism, but of a radical radicalism, which believes in doing and not in half doing.

I regret very much, indeed, Mr. President, to have discovered, or thought I had discovered, in the brief time I have been here, that there is such a thing on the floor of this Senate as conservative radicalism; and I tell any gentleman who is nursing conservative radicalism that that is not the radicalism of the people. We might as well, far removed as we are from the people by our position as Senators, remember that there is a people to whom every man in this Chamber is sooner or later to be accountable. And, sir, there is among that people a profound radicalism, a radicalism which has a strange and new-fashioned way of shelving those who vacillate or stagger, as well as those who desert. Some gentlemen of this body have had experience of that. Perhaps it is not without the range of possibility that some others may have similar experience in the not very distant future. Sir, I stand here as a representative, on the territory of the State to which I belong, of that determined radicalism which will tolerate not the least wavering in any man which it intrusts with a public position. Now, as one of the expressions of that very sentiment I offer this amendment, which is intended to perpetuate power in the rebel States in the hands of the loyal people, and to drag it out of the hands of a rebellious and wicked aristocracy.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I regret the wide range which this debate is taking, as I am exceedingly anxious that we should act upon the bill under consideration, perfect it as well as we may, and be in a position at an early day to adjourn the present session of Congress. But, sir, if we are to discuss all these questions of radicalism, and as to what is radical radicalism and conservative radicalism, and as to the men who falter and those who do not, I know not when we shall get a vote upon the bill or even upon the pending amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. Time is not important.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps not to the Senator from Missouri; but time is important to the people of this country. Time is very important, and it is important that at the earliest day practicable with the safety of this Union all its members should be restored to fraternal relations and feelings. But, sir, I am not to be betrayed into any discussion of what constitutes radicalism or is not radicalism. The question before the Senate calls for no such discussion. Nor will I even enter into an argument as to the respective merits of the viva voce and the ballot system. Much may be said in favor of each; but I by no means admit that the ballot system is the only system that is to preserve the liberties of this country. I never believed much in that kind of secrecy that withholds from the people the facts. I want to see every man an independent voter, not sneaking to the polls and hiding his expression in a secret ballot. Sir, it is by secret ballots and secret systems of other kinds that liberty has been trodden down everywhere. The "divine right of kings to rule" has a sort of mystery about it. I confide in the open, independent voter that goes to the polls and tells how he votes; and I have no such opinion of my fellow-countrymen, I have no such opinion of the masses of the people of this country, as to suppose that they dare not tell out how they vote. I do not believe in it at all. It leads to fraud, to ballot-box stuffing, and all sorts of cheating. You have no faith in these leaders of the South, and yet you are going to let them have the ballot-box, to change ballots, to stuff the ballot-box. You cannot do that when every man goes up to the polls and says, "I vote for the constitution; I vote for John Strong for Governor." There is no cheating then.

But I said—and I have almost forgotten myself—that I was not going to discuss that question. I wish to state a fact, however. It is not true that in most of the southern States the voting is viva voce. It is not so in Tennessee; I think not in the Carolinas. It is so in Virginia.

Mr. DRAKE. Tennessee is not a rebel State now, nor legislated for under this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not so in Carolina.

Mr. DRAKE. Which Carolina?

Mr. TRUMBULL. North Carolina, as I am informed since the gentleman was speaking. I understand it is not so in most of the southern States. It is so in Virginia, I believe; but I have been informed by a member of this body while the Senator was speaking that in most of the southern States the mode of voting is now by ballot.

But, sir, a sufficient objection, I think, to the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri is this: the object of this bill is to carry out a bill we have already passed; and in that bill we laid down the terms upon which we will recognize governments in the rebel States, and it is not one of those terms that they shall put into their constitutions a provision that they shall vote by ballot. The only object of this bill is to afford the machinery to carry out a law we have already passed; and shall we go on adding in each bill that we get up some new requirement before they have had any opportunity to act upon the proposition we have submitted? Now, sir, we have submitted to these people certain conditions upon which we will recognize their governments and receive representation into the Congress of the United States. It was thought that bill was not perfect. It was said that it provided no way by which the people could give expression to their feelings, to their opinions; that it pointed out no person to call a convention; that the result of leaving the legislation as it was by the act which we passed at the last session of Congress would be that different parties might get up conventions in the same State, and there would be danger of collisions, and of bloodshed even. In order to avoid that it was proposed by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] who introduced this bill substantially as it is now pending before the Senate, to designate a way by which the people might give expression to their opinions and determine whether they would proceed to create State governments in accordance with the requirements of Congress. That is all there is in this bill. Now, I object to putting upon it a new requirement.

As I have already stated, much might be said on the question of voting by ballot and viva voce. Different States have different modes of voting. In my State, until within a few years, we voted viva voce; but that has now been altered, and the mode of voting there is by ballot. The people thought it better to change to the ballot system, and I am not sure but that that is the best system. Each has its advantages and disadvantages. But I trust that no amendment of the character proposed will be put upon this bill, because it is an additional requirement, and, in my judgment, is not acting in good faith now when we are passing a bill merely supplemental to the other, and to enable the people to carry out the other, to impose new and additional conditions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I wish simply to say that I shall vote against the proposition of the honorable Senator from Missouri, not that I do not like it, because I prefer the ballot and should be willing to take any precaution to secure the ballot, but for the reason that in this bill, or in any bill that we pass, I am opposed, as I have been, to making a constitution for a State. We leave it to the States to make their own constitutions. Perhaps I would be in favor of it if the constitution when made was conclusive to bring about their admission; but in the bill which we passed we provided that the constitution when made should be submitted to Congress, and if approved by Congress then they might be entitled to representation. That I think sufficient for our security, and I prefer not to put this provision and that provision and the other provision which we desire to have in their constitution into a bill of this kind as preliminary, because I do not want to say to them in advance substantially, "If you do certain things I will agree to your constitution." I am not prepared to say what I shall agree to. I do not know what fault I shall find, and I do not want to say in advance, by implication even, that this is all I require. I prefer that their constitution when it comes here should pass under our examination, and that they should be at liberty to state our objections to it, and not be met with the remark, "If you object on this point or that why did you not put it in with other things in your act in the beginning?" I prefer to leave all these questions open for our consideration when the constitution is made and submitted to us for examination.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have sent for the case to which I referred; and before making a remark about it I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that I understood him to consent, upon my application, that I might interrupt him to propose a question to him. I had not the slightest idea of diverting him from his argument or in any way disturbing him; but as I understand he has since made some remark implying dissatisfaction at my having done it, which I was not able to catch where I sat, I wish to beg his pardon for the interruption, and at the same time to thank him for the very lucid answer which he gave to the question which he allowed me to put.

Mr. DRAKE. With the permission of the gentleman from New York—

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to say that I did not make any remark that I know of that expressed dissatisfaction with the interruption of the gentleman. The gentleman asked me to allow him to interrupt me to put a question, which I consented to, and out of that grew a debate between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Maine; and I finally remarked that I thought I had given way long enough, and that I would proceed with my argument.

Mr. CONKLING. I had no idea of interpolating a three-cornered duel [laughter] into the speech of the Senator; and I am very sorry if anything occurred about it which was in any way unsatisfactory to him.

I rose to say that I have sent for the case to which I alluded, the case of Pollard vs. Hagan, in 3 Howard, which does decide, and which did decide as long ago as 1845, the proposition which I stated, that a compact of this sort made by a community, pending its admission as a State, ceases to bind it when it consummates its Statehood and takes on the sovereignty of a member of the Union in all respects. That is the law as it was decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the land as long ago as I mentioned.

Mr. SUMNER. Was the court unanimous or divided? I ask for information.

Mr. CONKLING. I have not looked to see as to that. I will look to see. It is a long time since I have had occasion to look at the case. [After examining the volume.] There is no dissenting opinion. It is the case of Pollard vs. Hagan, 3 Howard, commencing at page 212.

Mr. SUMNER. Who gave the opinion?

Mr. CONKLING. Senators can look for themselves. Here is the book.

Mr. SUMNER. As the Senator had the book in his hand, I asked.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a somewhat long opinion.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely asked the name of the judge.

Mr. CONKLING. There are several opinions. I will look and state them, although I did not mean to take time to do so. Mr. Justice McKinley, I find, gave one opinion; Mr. Justice Catron one, and nobody else seems to have written. There is no dissenting opinion, and the decision of the court is to the effect which I have stated.

I was going to say that is the decision of the Supreme Court made long ago, and it has been made repeatedly since, where that was a point in judgment, and it was referred to afterward. I cannot state the cases, but I recollect that in substance the question has often been up.

Mr. JOHNSON. That decision has never been doubted.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe it has never been doubted that that was the law. I am aware, of course, that upon the question of admitting a Senator or member to a seat what the Supreme Court had said upon a question of law would not be obligatory upon either House. I did not suggest it with any such view; but merely to show that the settled law as law upon this point was against the proposition submitted by the Senator from Missouri.

That is all I want to say about it, except that I have very great doubt, like the Senator from Illinois, whether a perpetual provision in a constitution, if you could imbed it there, that voting should always be by ballot and never otherwise, would tend to the security of any one or anything, and last of all to the security of those people who by reason of their helplessness or their ignorance may be supposed to require protection. I can understand how a man who is unable to read a ballot, who may be deceived or cheated in that mode of voting, may be able as infallibly as any member of this body to go to the polls and proclaim with his tongue whether he votes for one candidate or another, for one party or another. Therefore, upon both the considerations which I conceive enter into the question of this amendment, I shall vote against it.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, at the risk of being classed a "conservative radical," I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Missouri. I have had some little experience in this matter of the secret ballot. Some fifteen years ago we of Massachusetts enacted a secret ballot law, and we were right confident that we had made a great radical reform; but when the day of election came round, and our people, who had ever been accustomed to the open ballot were required to put their votes in sealed envelopes, they somehow got it into their heads that our great radical reform was just no reform at all. So the compulsory portion of the secret ballot law went down, and some of its friends went down for a time with it, and no one now thinks of sealing up his vote.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator from Massachusetts allow me to suggest to him that the word "secret" is not in this amendment.

Mr. WILSON. The expression is "closed ballot."

Mr. DRAKE. "Closed ballot," such as you say is voted in Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. With the Senator from Missouri I am for the ballot instead of the viva voce mode of voting, and I trust that these States in their new constitutions will abandon the one and adopt the other, but I do not wish to make this new mode of voting a condition-precursor to restoration. I fear this people will think we are trifling with them. I fear that our friends everywhere will think we are seeking here new grounds of difference rather than a reasonable plan of adjustment if we insist on making questions of this character conditions of the final restoration of these States to their practical relations.

For years the country has been stirred to its profoundest depths by the mighty conflict between the vital forces of freedom and slavery. Opinion grappled with opinion until the bloody issues of civil war were precipitated upon the country. In the stern conflict of ideas and in the sterner conflict of arms we have swept the field. Our ideas and our arms are completely victorious; our power is assured, and our ideas are to be the accepted opinions of our country so long as that country shall last.

We have been the champions of emancipation, of civil rights, of enfranchisement, of political equality. By a series of legislative acts, by the immortal proclamation of emancipation, by the great constitutional amendment, slavery went down forever in America, and four million bondmen were clothed with the rights of freemen. By the enactment of that great measure, the civil rights bill, these freemen were declared citizens of the United States and entitled to all the civil rights that belonged to other citizens of the Republic. By the fourteenth article of the Amendments to the Constitution, now, I maintain, a part of the Constitution of the United States—

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

This grand, comprehensive, and all-embracing provision of the Constitution, which Congress is empowered to enforce by appropriate legislation, makes every man from the Potomac to the Rio Grande before the law as free as the Senators who sit in this Chamber.

By the provisions of the act for the more efficient government of the rebel States the people of those States are required to adopt the constitutional amendment that takes forever from them the power to abridge the privileges or immunities of their three and a half million colored men, or to deprive the humblest of them of life, liberty, or property, or to deny to them the equal protection of the laws; to conform their own State constitutions to the provisions of the amendment, and to concede to their late bondmen, fully and completely, the unrestricted right of manhood suffrage. The nation has dictated to the people of the States lately in rebellion these conditions, which they must accept ere Senators and Representatives of theirs can sit in these Chambers, and their Senators and their Representatives must in addition be able to take the iron-clad oath of office. The triumph of the power of the nation is complete; the triumph of the ideas of the nation is complete.

From all sections of the rebel States comes the intelligence that masses of the people lately in rebellion are ready to accept the conditions imposed by the nation and to comply with the terms which the nation, in the plenitude of its power, exacts. To carry into effect the act for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and to facilitate the restoration of these States to their practical relations with the Government, I introduced this bill on the 7th day of March. It was carefully drawn, and received the sanction of gentlemen of talent and character. On the 9th it was taken up by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and its leading features received the unanimous support of the committee. On the same day it was taken up by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives and amended in some of its details; reported to the House on the 11th, and on the same day it passed the House. On the 13th this bill comes back from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary with the pending amendment in the nature of a substitute, the House bill and the substitute of the committee being in form and substance, in purpose and in name, the bill introduced by me on the 7th of the month.

The amendment adopted by the House of Representatives, that the persons appointed to complete the registration and superintend the election shall take the oath prescribed by the act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office," weakens our political friends rather than our political enemies. It is a restriction, not upon the men whose sympathies are with the rebellion, but a restriction upon men who earnestly desire the complete restoration of those States to their practical relations, who steadfastly support the Constitution and obey the laws, and who are in sympathy with and desire to affiliate with the great Union Republican party of the United States. In Virginia, in North Carolina, in the other States lately in rebellion, there are thousands of earnest, sincere men, who went into the rebellion or who were dragged into the rebellion, who clearly see and confess their mistake, who are now with their country and for their country, who joyously accept the policy of freedom and enfranchisement, who desire to stand upon our platform and to bear our flag in the conflicts of the future. These men know their States and the people of their States, their public men and private citizens; they desire to fight, and they will fight our battles if we will trust them and permit them to do so.

I am for trusting these earnest, sincere men, although they were once in some degree compromised by the rebellion. I want to see the six hundred thousand freedmen in the rebel States now entitled to the right of suffrage, the tried and ever true loyal men, and the now sincere and earnest, but once deluded men, banded together and united with us as a part of the great party of patriotism and liberty, justice and humanity. This combination, if made as it can be made and ought to be made, would give us North Carolina and South Carolina, Alabama and Louisiana, and slake the power of men whose sympathies are still with the rebellion in several other States. If we would aid in thus combining the real and steadfast friends of the country in the future we must treat with generous confidence the men who seek to cooperate with us, and not meet their proffered support with averted faces and continued distrust and reproaches. If these States are organized as they should be, if we are firm in principle, generous in speech, and kind in act, now that we are complete masters of the situation, these rebel States that plunged into the fire and blood of revolution, that struggled to exhaustion through a four years' war to dismember the Union and perpetuate human slavery, will be as radical as the radical radicals of Missouri, so well represented by the honorable member whose amendment is now pending.

Willing as I am to trust our military commanders to select officers and persons to make the registration, confident as I am that there are hundreds of earnest and sincere men whose knowledge and whose services would be of infinite value in this work, I regret that the House of Representatives, under the lead of the Judiciary Committee of that body, should have insisted on applying the iron-clad oath of office, and thus casting away knowledge and service almost invaluable to us. I humbly submit that this policy does not tend to hasten on the day when men who accept our faith and creed shall have controlling majorities in the rebel States.

The House of Representatives, too, under the lead of its Judiciary Committee, struck out the sixth section of my bill, authorizing the commanding general of each district at his own discretion to permit the acting Governor of any State to perform the duties imposed by this act. My purpose was to allow Governor Peirpoint, of Virginia, and Governor Murphy, of Arkansas, who thoroughly understand the people and the public men of their States, who know those who can be trusted and those who cannot, with the consent of their commanding generals, to superintend the registration of the votes in their respective States. I have the utmost confidence in General Schofield and in General Ord, but they cannot possibly know the men of those States who may be intrusted to perform the duties imposed by this act so well as the Governors I have named.

The Judiciary Committee of the Senate has made an amendment in the first section of the bill, that like these two amendments of the House of Representatives is calculated to strengthen our political enemies. The original oath required that every elector should solemnly swear that he was sincerely and earnestly attached to the Government of the United States, and would steadfastly support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and encourage all others to such support and obedience. This oath ignored the rebellion, required no test concerning it; it dealt, not with the issues of the past, but with the present and the future. It may be that there is a class of men—I hope not a large one—who passionately hate the Union and the Government of the United States; who will not support the Constitution nor obey the laws, and will not encourage others to such support and obedience. The country and their States might well spare this class of men; and if they should shrink from taking this oath of fidelity and obedience, the country and its friends might at least for the present gain something by their absence from the ballot-box. I regret that the committee should have stricken from that oath the words that required them to swear that they were sincerely and earnestly attached to the Government of the United States. In spite, however, of these three amendments to my original bill, which amendments I sincerely believe are calculated to weaken the friends of the Government and to weaken those in the rebel States who ought to act with us and who desire to act with us, I shall cheerfully yield my own convictions to the perhaps better judgment of others.

The Thirty-Ninth Congress, in obedience to the clearly-expressed will of the nation, distinctly laid down the conditions of reconstruction and restoration. In spite of the action of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, of political organizations and public men, the nation is as firmly resolved to enforce those conditions as it was to crush out the rebellion with the iron hand of war. The men of the South, whose fields have been blighted by war, whose fortunes have been wasted, whose sons have fallen in the bloody strife, cannot fail to see the impotency of the Executive and the abortive efforts of his friends to arrest or baffle the determined purpose of the nation. Men who sincerely desire peace, who accept the results of the war, who desire the protection of law, and who are struggling to restore their wasted fortunes, are turning to Congress, to those who represent the will of the nation, and are asking us for a well-defined plan to carry into practical operation the conditions we have imposed upon them. This bill was framed and introduced to meet the needs of the country, and its prompt adoption by the Fortieth Congress will facilitate the acceptance of the conditions we have imposed, and the restoration of the States lately in rebellion. I believe the hour has come when the victors in the great conflict through which the nation has passed and is passing should strive by generous words and deeds to convince their countrymen lately in armed rebellion against their native land that we embrace in our affection the whole country and the people of the whole country, and that we would forgive, forget, and unite.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I shall say but a word in relation to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Missouri. In the first place, I believe that it is unconstitutional to attempt to impose any such condition upon a future State of the Union. The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land over the States within this Union, and any law which Congress may pass, any compact which Congress may enter into with any State, is as a matter of course subordinated to the Constitution itself, and the Constitution leaves to each State full power over the regulation of suffrage. It is, therefore, impossible for Congress to impose any such condition. Besides all that, we have heard from the decision of the supreme judicial tribunal that all such compacts are utterly null and void, for the plainest reason in the world, that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall be through in about five minutes.

Mr. DRAKE. I merely wanted to call the Senator's attention to a matter in connection with that remark.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think I shall finish what I have to say without any discourtesy to the honorable Senator from Missouri, and I fear that the interruption may perhaps protract the discussion longer than I desire.

The Missouri compact, which has been referred to, was a provision inserted in the act admitting Missouri, that the State of Missouri, in substance, should not violate the Constitution of the United States; or rather that one of the sections of the constitution of Missouri which was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States should never be enforced. There was no compact between Congress and Missouri for any new provision; but that section of the constitution of Missouri which authorized the Legislature to declare that no free colored citizen should ever come into the State of Missouri was held by Congress to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and therefore it was that Congress said in the act admitting Missouri that that section of the constitution of Missouri should be regarded as null and void forever. I do not quote the precise language, but I am stating the substance. All that Congress declared was that Missouri should not violate the Constitution of the United States. So that case is no precedent whatever.

Mr. President, I did not intend to be led off into the discussion of anything else than the precise question before the Senate upon the pending amendment. I am opposed to the amendment for the reason that I think we have no power to bind any State in the future by any provision that Congress may adopt which the Constitution of the United States itself does not impose; and the very constitutional amendment which is submitted to the States, and which it is required of the States shall be adopted by them as a part of the basis of reconstruction, assumes that each State shall have the power to regulate the question of suffrage and to prescribe the qualifications of voters.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to hear this amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. DRAKE.

Mr. MORTON. I would respectfully suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he can attain all that he desires by his amendment and yet leave off the last and the objectionable clause, which is that containing the statement that this shall never be changed. I do not believe we have the right to lay a perpetual obligation upon an incoming State or upon a State that is about to be restored. We can prescribe the conditions upon which we will admit a State. We can say, "You shall put universal suffrage in the constitution," or "You shall put voting by ballot in the constitution, or we will not receive you." But after the State has been received, it is at liberty then to amend its constitution in any manner so that it maintains a republican form of government. We cannot bind any State not to amend the constitution, so that the amendment be consistent with a republican form of government; but we can say that those constitutions shall not be accepted, in the first place, unless they contain a provision that the voting shall be by ballot; and that will answer all the purpose the Senator from Missouri wishes to attain; for if that provision is once fixed in a constitution it can never be gotten out; the secret ballot will prevent it from being taken out.

If this change were made in the amendment I could vote for it most heartily. I believe it to be of the utmost importance to the South, far more so than in Massachusetts or Indiana or any of the northern States. Bear in mind that the South is divided into large plantations, large landed estates, and that the great mass of the colored voters are tenants upon these estates. They are dependent. Let me suppose a case where there are fifty colored voters upon one plantation; their little homes are upon that plantation; they are dependent upon the owner of it for their employment and their daily food. If he is a candidate and stands by the polls, and these poor men come up to vote, and understand full well that if they vote against him they will be ejected from their homes and lose their employment, I say they are not independent voters. It is, therefore, necessary to secure the independence of such voters that they be allowed to vote by ballot, and to vote secretly, so that their votes cannot be inspected by the men who have the power to drive them from their houses and to deprive them of the means of making a living.

Sir, the case is widely different in the South from what it is in the North; but the secret ballot is important everywhere where there is a dependent laboring population; and the peculiar circumstances by which the southern people are now surrounded make it far more important than ever. If the Senator from Missouri will modify his amendment so as simply to require them to put a provision for the ballot in their constitutions, without saying that they never can change the constitution in that particular, I am for it. But, sir, when these States are once in here they are equal. Each State has a right to amend its constitution in any manner consistent with the republican form of government. If they were to put it in their constitution and afterward change it in violation of the compact made here to-day I disagree entirely with the Senator from Missouri that we could expel their representatives from this Chamber. Such a doctrine cannot be maintained under the Constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before this subject passes from the Senate I desire to correct my colleague in one statement that he was, in the haste of debate, led to make in reply to the Senator from New York. If I understood him aright, he stated that in 1847 the State of Missouri had passed an act providing that free negroes might be sold into slavery. If my colleague remembers aright I am very much mistaken. My recollection of the legislation was that in 1847 the Legislature passed an act that free negroes should not again be permitted to come into the State unless they gave bond and security of resident white persons who had already resided in the State; but in 1859 both branches of the Legislature passed an act providing that all those who had come in subsequent to 1847 might be or should be sold into slavery, which act my colleague voted against, and he will remember that the Executive, Mr. Stewart, at that time vetoed the bill. Hence there never was a law upon the statute-books of Missouri providing for the sale of free negroes into slavery. In that particular I think he has done our State injustice, perhaps in the haste of debate. That is my recollection of the legislation of the State.

Now, one word in reference to the other point. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, that at the time of the admission of the State of Missouri there was a clause in the State constitution enabling the Legislature to pass laws prohibiting the immigration of free negroes into the State. Before the admission, however, Congress passed an act requiring that the Legislature then in session should agree by solemn vote that that provision of the constitution should never authorize legislation in conflict with the provision of the Federal Constitution, which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. It was merely a compact that we should not violate the Constitution of the United States, which was certainly a very proper compact. It was not, however, by virtue of that compact, but by virtue of the Constitution itself, that the ablest lawyers of the State regarded the legislative act of 1847 to be against the Constitution; that is, to be unauthorized, not because there had been a compact, but because of the existence of this provision of the Constitution of the United States that it was illegal and void. However, I state as my colleague stated, that there never was a case made up. Although free negroes immigrated to the State and gave their bonds, I do not remember that any case ever appeared before the supreme court of our State contesting the right to require those bonds. I can state, and I do state now, that it was regarded by the ablest legal and judicial minds of the State that the act itself was absolutely void in consequence of this provision of the Constitution of the United States. That was always my opinion, though I did not rank among those men. It was the opinion of a great many who were not as good lawyers perhaps as my colleague and others.

Now, Mr. President, in reference to the amendment that is pending, offered by my colleague, I am not prepared to say that it would be expedient, and I am certainly prepared to say that in my judgment we cannot require it in all time to come of these States. I do not think that upon the admission of a State we should vary the terms that we have usually employed in the admission of States, namely, that when admitted they are upon equal terms with the other States. I believe that it is universal; I may be mistaken, but I do not remember that any State has ever been admitted into the Union that that language was not used.

Mr. JOHNSON. Equal in all respects?

Mr. HENDERSON. In all respects, upon an equal footing with the other States of the Union. If such a provision should be required of one of these States, it certainly, when admitted, would not be upon an equal footing with the States already in. It would be requiring, not as in the case of Missouri, that a provision of the Federal Constitution should not be violated, but it would be requiring something at their hands that is not required in the Federal Constitution. If I understand the rights of the States it has always been admitted that a State might adopt or reject the ballot system.

Now, I will state to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] that my colleague's amendment does not accomplish what he desires. It does not provide for a secret ballot, but a closed ballot. Hence, the very end desired by the Senator from Indiana will not be accomplished. The closed ballot yet enables the planter to ascertain how the negro has voted without any trouble; and to go beyond the closed ballot will, I humbly suggest to the Senator from Indiana, be going too far, because it will be opening the door to frauds which may be perpetrated on the other side. The secret ballot, as I understand it, is a ballot where it is impossible to ascertain the name of the party that votes; but the closed ballot, on the other hand, enables us to examine the ballot-box and ascertain how individuals vote. The ballot is numbered and put into the box, and hence it is an easy matter to determine how any man has voted. The secret ballot, on the other hand, opens the door to frauds innumerable; and I believe the very great objection which was presented here in 1857 and 1858, with regard to the Kansas constitution, was that the voting was by secret ballot; and we know the frauds that were perpetrated in that State upon the occasion of electing delegates, and also in the vote upon the constitution. I am not prepared to vote for the secret ballot; but if the closed ballot is adopted the very difficulty that my colleague and the Senator from Indiana want to avoid will not be avoided, and it will not accomplish what they desire.

Now, Mr. President, I have said enough to indicate my views on this subject. I cannot vote for the amendment, because I think that it would be inexpedient to adopt it, however constitutional it might be; but I think it has been clearly admitted on all hands that we cannot constitutionally require it after a State has been admitted.

Mr. MORTON. One word in explanation. By the secret ballot I mean a ballot upon which the voter does not put his name, which he folds up and puts into the box, and you cannot possibly tell who voted that ticket unless by the color of the paper or some particular form of folding which may be observed by those who are present. I do not mean a ballot that is numbered to bear a corresponding number to that on the poll-book, by which a man's vote may be ascertained, but I mean the ordinary way of voting in the western and I believe in nearly all the States—a ticket blank on one side and printed on the other, which is folded up and put into the box, and the vote cannot be told unless by the color of the paper or some other sign that party politicians sometimes understand who manipulate such matters.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not often the case that the paper is colored or marked in some way?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from Indiana how an election in which the ballots were cast in that way could ever be contested? In my State the ballots are numbered, the numbers corresponding with the numbers on the poll-book, so as to show, in case illegal votes are put in, exactly how many ought to be there. Unless something of that kind is done how are you ever going to ascertain that there is not ballot-box stuffing?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think, Mr. President, that the advantages of the vote by ballot, as it is familiarly termed, have been overestimated, overestimated both in this country and abroad in former years, and I believe the inclination of mind with all those who have investigated political questions of this description in recent years has been in favor of the immediate or ultimate abandonment of this mode of taking the sense of the electoral body. Why, sir, we all know that throughout the entire North and West, wherever elections are held in a form intended to be secret or to secure secrecy in point or fact, it is known how almost every individual elector casts his vote; the fact transpires; it is known beforehand, or the fact is obtained at the time the vote is given. I suppose that, practically speaking, pretty much the only result obtained by a system of voting by ballot in this country is the opportunity for a very adroit and cunning person to deceive others: that is, it leads to nothing but deception, and deception which can only be practiced by the cunning, and which cannot be and is not practiced by the simple, for whose protection the system was originally established. It is idle to attempt to protect the employé from the influence of his employer by a system of this kind. That independence must rest upon a more stable foundation; it must have its root, its source, in the intellectual qualities of the elector himself. If he be a subservient man his employer will dictate his vote, and your system of secrecy will be no protection to the public against his influence.

One other remark, and I will conclude. I object to the attempt in this manner to establish immutable principles in formation of constitutions in this country. I think the idea which obtained in former years in the State of New York and in many other States of subjecting the question of constitutional reform to a vote at stated and periodical intervals of time was a wise and sagacious one. We have gone from the beginning upon the principle that political improvement has no limit and no boundary, and that as we discover an improvement we shall possess the means, the facilities for establishing it in practice. Now, sir, this system of vote by ballot, if not wholly inconsistent with further electoral reform, will be, at least it may be found, exceedingly inconvenient in attempting to secure such reform.

I hope, sir, to see the day when votes given by the citizens will be registered in an open and public manner, and be kept in a repository under the security of law, so that every ballot can be examined, at least for a considerable period after the election is held. I hope also to find it provided that these votes so registered and preserved shall be given by the citizen in such manner that we shall secure, what we intended to secure originally, an actual representation of the whole mass of the people, instead of a representation of only a part, which is our present imperfect system. We may advance to this if we are not fettered by absurd obstacles set up in blindness and in contempt of the wisdom of the future. We may obtain a reform which will reach the point which I have stated, possibly, first by taking the system of cumulative voting, allowing the elector, where there are a dozen candidates in a State to be elected, to cumulate his vote upon any number less than the whole, by which it will happen inevitably that each political interest in a community will obtain a representation exactly proportioned to its numbers and to its weight in the social body.

Then we may possibly advance further and obtain that which is sought, at least sought to be explained in recent publications by profound thinkers abroad, a system of personal representation by which, at all events in large States and where large numbers of persons are to be elected to office, each elector may be enabled to vote for a man who will be chosen and who will represent in point of fact the persons who vote for him, and not upon theory, which is falsehood, represent other persons who do not.

These reforms are necessary, in my judgment, if our republican system is to continue, if it is to go on and accomplish the results which were intended when the system was originally established and the results of which it is capable.

However, sir, as I suppose there is very little peril or danger in the present case that this amendment will be adopted, I do not intend to protract the discussion upon it. I desired only to say enough to indicate the leading reasons for my dissent from it, and why I shall vote against its adoption.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are a large number of messages on the table that ought to be referred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. Let us dispose of this amendment first. It is only four o'clock, and it is very desirable that we should get along with this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. We shall not be able to reach a vote to-night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us get to the vote on this amendment at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion if we can have a vote without further discussion; but if any Senators are desirous to debate the question further I must insist on my motion, for I wish to have these executive messages referred. It is necessary it should be done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There will be time to refer the messages; it is only four o'clock. We are not in the habit of adjourning before five. If there is to be more speaking let us hear it now.

Mr. HENDERSON. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I do not care to say anything more at this time in regard to this amendment if there are other Senators who wish to speak. All I wish is the privilege, which I believe is always accorded to the mover of a proposition, to close the debate upon it. If any other gentleman wishes to speak I will give way to him.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to say a word upon this amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator desires to speak, I hope he will give way if he would as lief speak to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Only one word, he says.

Mr. HENDERSON. We shall not get a vote this evening.

Mr. SUMNER. I, too, have something to say.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I have a very few words to say; I do not make long speeches. I merely wish to explain the effect of the viva voce system of voting as it exists in our State. The viva voce system was established in our State during the Democratic reign; and since the commencement of this rebellion that party has been very desirous to repeal the act establishing it. As time progressed we desired to know who were the loyal people, and who those were who were in sympathy with the rebellion, and we found a very convenient system established for that purpose in this mode of voting, and the loyal people of Oregon then opposed the repeal of the act, and we found it very advantageous to us in securing and maintaining loyalty in the State of Oregon.

I believe that this amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will not accomplish the object he desires. I expect to see the time when those who were in sympathy with and who inaugurated this rebellion will be odious in the eyes of the people of the South as well as of the whole Union, and when those who have maintained and sustained the Government in this trying time will be honored and elevated in that portion of the country. I think that the people there who are to inaugurate these new governments, who are to control them in the outset, will in the first instance provide for voting by ballot; but as they progress, if they shall see the necessity for a change, if they shall desire to establish the system of viva voce voting, I wish so to leave them that they shall have that privilege. But the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri places it entirely out of the power of the loyal people of the South, if they desire to change the system of voting from the ballot to viva voce to do so.

The planters, the wealthy men, by their wealth may influence the votes of those simple-minded people who are employed by them, many of whom do not know how to read. Those loyal men who are looking after the interests of those people may see that it is necessary to establish the system of viva voce voting in the progress of the times in order to protect these men from imposition. I see the time coming when it will be necessary perhaps for them to establish that system; and therefore, as a matter of expediency and as a matter that I think is for the benefit of those people, I feel it my duty to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. I desire to state as a reason for not going into executive session now that we ought not to act in this way unless it is the intention of Senators to stay here and continue Congress in session. Are we to have an hour or two's debate on an amendment, and then adjourn? It will be discussed as long probably to-morrow as to-day. I apprehend there are some Senators who may be willing to protract debate on these side amendments and take up time and keep Congress in session here until the dog-days; but I do not believe that is the intention of the Senate. If it is not, let us sit until the usual hour, half past four o'clock, before we go into executive business or do any other business than consider the bill under consideration. I hope we shall not go into executive session now.

Mr. DRAKE. I suppose the remarks of the Senator from Illinois has reference to me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I have no reference to the gentleman.

Mr. DRAKE. So far as time is concerned, all the time that is spent here in making this bill all that it ought to be, under the circumstances of this case, is time well spent, even if it does take us to the dog-days.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very far from attempting to interfere with the progress of this bill, and I do not wish to make any motion that the Senator from Illinois, who has it in charge, may consider inimical to it. I desire to have speedy action on it. My only object was to get some executive messages that were lying upon the table referred, but if the Senator insists upon it I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.]

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, if there is any other gentleman who wishes to speak I will not—

Mr. SUMNER. I understood there were several Senators who wished to speak.

Mr. DRAKE. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. Though I suppose they were all naturally reluctant to speak to a Senate that had become so impatient as this is now. I certainly have no desire to intrude my opinions on this question upon a reluctant Senate; I think we had better, therefore, now proceed to the consideration of executive business. I believe we have arrived at a natural stage in the course of this discussion, and that the interests of our business will be best consulted now by going on with the executive business. ["Make the motion."] I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Dixon, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Tipton, Trumbull, Williams, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Edmunds, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Wiley—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 14, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION CONTEST—DELANO VS. MORGAN.

The SPEAKER presented papers in the contested-election case of Delano vs. Morgan; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ELECTION CONTEST—HOGAN VS. FILE.

The SPEAKER also presented papers in the case of Hogan vs. File; which were referred to the same committee.

OVERISSUES OF CURRENCY AND BONDS.

Mr. COVODE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas statements have been made on the floor of this House and in the columns of the press, to the effect that grave irregularities and delinquencies exist in the Currency Bureau and other branches of the Treasury Department that there have been over-issues of currency, that the Government bonds of various denominations have been duplicated, and that coupons of duplicated bonds have been presented for redemption and paid; and whereas such statements are calculated to cause great uneasiness in business circles; and whereas it is due to the officers and servants of the Treasury Department that such statements should be inquired into, and, if groundless, should be authoritatively and definitively contradicted and set at rest; and it is due to the people of the United States that, if true, such delinquencies and malversations as have been charged on the floor of this House and elsewhere should be exposed and corrected: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed whose duty it shall be, and they are hereby authorized and empowered, to investigate all such charges, to examine the accounts, books, and records of the Treasury Department, and to report to this House as early as practicable: First, The present outstanding indebtedness of the Government of the United States, as far as it is practicable to ascertain it, as represented by currency, bonds, interest notes, or other promises to pay. Second, The deficiencies, if any exist, exhibited by such books, accounts, and papers. Third, The amount of currency, if any, issued over and above what appears by the books of the Treasury Department. Fourth, If duplicate five-twenty, seven-thirty, or ten-forty bonds and coupons of the United States have been sent in for redemption and payment, and how many such bonds and coupons have been redeemed and paid. Fifth, As to any other irregularities that may be called to the attention of the committee, and upon which they may deem it advisable to report.

Resolved, That said committee be authorized and empowered to hold their sessions during the sessions of the House and recess of Congress, and that they be furthermore empowered to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. COVODE. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The rules cannot be suspended on this day.

Mr. COVODE. I give notice, then, that I will move to suspend the rules on Monday.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to ask the gentleman to make his resolution more specific in order that we may understand what he is aiming at?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order.

Mr. CHANLER. I will then suggest a modification. The gentleman speaks in the preamble of irregularities that may be found to exist in the Treasury Department which he desires should come under the cognizance of the committee to be appointed. Now, although that may mean something, yet it is too indefinite to be of any value as the basis of any charge against the Department.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions are not before the House.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to fix the time for the election of Representatives and Delegates in the Congress of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EIGHT-HOUR SYSTEM.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill constituting eight hours a day's work for all mechanics and laborers employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be reported.

The bill was accordingly reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that there is probably no objection to this bill and that we may as well dispose of it now.

Mr. JULIAN. I should be very glad to have it disposed of now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the German Independent Evangelical Lutheran Congregation of St. John, in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and are hereby, requested to inform the House under whose supervision the Congressional Directory of the Fortieth Congress is published, and why its publication was not delayed until the committees were appointed and the names corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Committee on Printing has not yet been appointed. The Chair will also state that there is a law requiring this Directory to be prepared for publication by the clerk of the joint Committee on Printing within six days of the commencement of the session.

Mr. MILLER. I move, then, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing when appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

SAILORS' PAY.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Hon. John T. Hoffman and other citizens of New York, asking for the extension of the same privilege to sailors honorably discharged as is now extended by law to soldiers; which was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs when appointed.

WRECK OF STEAMSHIP SCOTLAND.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move that the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table, with the view of taking up a Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER. That would require unani-mous consent. If the committees should first be called for reports, it would then be in the power of a majority to proceed to business on the Speaker's table. If no objection be made the House can do it now.

No objection being made, the House proceeded to the consideration of Senate joint resolution for the repeal of the joint resolution providing for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland, approved January 9, 1867.

The joint resolution received its several readings, and was passed.

PRINTING PAPER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the reply of the Congressional Printer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 11, 1867, respecting the purchase of printing paper; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

COLORADO CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to make a report from the Committee of Elections on the contested-election case from the Territory of Colorado. I ask that the resolution accompanying the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the papers and evidence relating to the right of A. C. Hunt and George M. Chilcott to a seat in the United States Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Colorado be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to report which, if either, of said claimants is entitled thereto; and that the committee have power to require the service of such notices, and grant such time for taking further evidence, as they may deem proper.

The resolution and the report were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERR. I submit a minority report accompanied by a resolution declaring that A. C. Hunt, one of the claimants, is entitled prima facie to the seat.

The minority report was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire whether the two reports will be printed together?

The SPEAKER. Such reports always are.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. RANDALL's motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BEAMAN, it was agreed to; and thereupon (at twelve o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CAKE: The petition of workmen of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, numerously signed, asking Congress to legislate for those whose daily bread is earned by the sweat of their brows, and to remain in session until a proper tariff for the protection of American industry becomes a law.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa: The petition of citizens of Iowa and Dakota, in relation to the Sioux city and Pacific railroad.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. ISAAC WESCOTT, D. D., of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECESS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that, unless otherwise ordered, the Senate at five o'clock this afternoon take a recess until half past seven.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not see any occasion for that at this early stage of the session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The occasion for it is to finish the bill we have under consideration.

Mr. POMEROY. We may be able to get a vote on it before five o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If we do, we can dispense with the recess; but from the indications, yesterday I do not see any prospect of getting a vote by that time.

Mr. POMEROY. I am willing to take a recess and continue during the evening and night, if necessary, to pass the bill; but I hope we can get a vote before five o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope so, too.

Mr. SUMNER. I see no occasion for pressing a bill of such importance in this way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the Senate does, from the very fact of its being important.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that this course will be taken, and that the Senate by a sufficient vote will show their determination to pass the bill at an early day. There is an evident disposition on the part of some Senators to procrastinate the consideration of the measure with a view of continuing this session. This is done disregardful of the wishes of many Senators who desire to bring the session to a close, and disregardful, too, as I think, of the settled conviction of the country, that after we have disposed of the most imperative business demanding our attention we should go from here, and let the business of the country have rest and peace. I hope the Senate will determine to act upon this measure definitely within the earliest possible time, and for my part I am willing to sit to-night until it is done.

Mr. DRAKE. I should be glad if the Senator from California would specify the Senators to whom he refers when he says that there is an evident disposition to procrastinate action on this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, if my honorable friend from Missouri, to use a homely phrase, is to carry a chip on his shoulder and imagine that every reference made here is made to him, he will find it very disagreeable, indeed. I reply to him as a Senator did yesterday, that he was not in my mind. I have the right to make such a reference as I did without being called to account.

Mr. DRAKE. No doubt, Mr. President, the Senator from California has an undoubted right to make such a reference; but as it so happens that yesterday in the discussion of this bill I was the only member who attempted to amend it, I did not see that there was any other application of the gentleman's remark which could have been intended but to me. I wish to say, sir, in regard to this matter, that I have no disposition to procrastinate action upon the bill one moment longer than is necessary to put it in a shape in which, according to my judgment, it is best for the interests of the country that it should be put.

I have to say further, in regard to the duration of this session, that those gentlemen who in the Thirty-Ninth Congress passed the act requiring this session to be held ought not, in my opinion, to be the very first to endeavor to cut it short. I do not know what the new Senators and Representatives were brought here for in this extra session if it was not to give full attention to the public interests to every extent that the public interests require. And, sir, now is not the time, in my opinion, for us to be impatient to get away from here until we have guarded every point in reference to the public interests.

Mr. CONNESS. There has been nothing said that I am aware of to the old or new Senators but by my honorable friend from Missouri. The Thirty-Ninth Congress are doubtless responsible for what they did during their official period; and for my part I have no apology to make for any part that I had in their action. My friend, the honorable Senator from Missouri, will have abundant time, I think, without extending this session unnecessarily, to bring his judgment to bear upon the affairs of the country. I am very free to admit that the addition of his judgment will be a great advantage; I so believe, and I had no reference to the honorable Senator in what I had to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock until half past seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of the equalization of soldiers' bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of aid being granted by the national Government for the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad; which were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, recommending appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am desired to present the memorial of the delegates of the Choctaw nation concerning their claims for very large sums, which they say are due to them by treaties with the United States. This is a subject on which the Senate have heard a good deal lately. It is a matter that ought to be thoroughly investigated; and I have prepared a resolution covering its reference, which I ask to have adopted now:

Resolved, That the memorial from the Choctaw nation of Indians, submitted this day, and all the reports and papers relating to the treaties and the claims of the said Indians against the Government of the United States, now filed among the papers of the Finance and Indian Committees, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, with instructions to examine said claims, and with leave to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the recess, to report by bill or otherwise at the next session of the Senate.

I am informed that some examination of the facts, as well as an inspection of the papers, will be necessary, and perhaps an inspection of the land, or something of that kind. In order to have the examination full and perfect, so that we may have definite action and settle the whole matter, I have prepared this resolution, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The resolution provides, I understand, that the committee are to sit during the recess.

Mr. SHERMAN. May sit. They may want to take testimony, or to authorize the chairman to do it.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred a memorial of citizens of Alexandria and a memorial of the city council and commissioners of election of Alexandria relative to the election held in that city on the 5th of March, 1867, asked to be discharged from their consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Ethan A. Jenks, late captain and brevet major seventh regiment Rhode Island volunteers, praying for pay and allowances from May 4 to September 9, 1863, while under sentence of dismissal from the service, to which he was afterward reinstated, reported a bill (S. No. 75) for the relief of Ethan A. Jenks, late a captain in the seventh regiment of Rhode Island volunteers; which was read and passed to a second reading.

NEW EDITION OF THE RULES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk be directed to prepare a correct edition of the Constitution, Rules of the Senate, Joint Rules of the two Houses, and the Manual, and that five hundred copies of the same be printed and bound for the use of the Senate.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on

Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the bankrupt law be printed for the use of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILLEY, it was Ordered, That the memorial of J. H. Merrill, praying for compensation for services as captain in the naval brigade, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, it was Ordered, That the memorial and papers of John A. Suter be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of A. H. Markland, praying for compensation for property destroyed by United States soldiers in Paducah, Kentucky, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. Harriet W. Pond be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the petition and papers in the case of J. B. Braden, of Minnesota, be taken from the files and referred, along with the new evidence which I now submit, to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF FRICTION MATCHES.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report a joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) amending the ninth section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it on its passage.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to so far amend the fifth division of the ninth section of the act of August 30, 1852, that inspectors may, in the license therein provided for, exempt a steamer from the obligation to carry in a safe, chest, or compartment composed or lined with metal, compact packages of friction matches securely packed in strong, tight wooden chests or boxes, the covers of which shall be firmly fastened on by locks, screws, or other fastenings, and which shall be stowed in a safe part of the steamer designated in the license by the inspectors, and at a safe distance from any fire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that a similar joint resolution was passed by the Senate at the last session, but failed in the other House through the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce there. I simply renew it as it was passed by the Senate at the last session.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOWLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 70) to establish and declare the railroad and bridges of the New Orleans, Mobile, and Chattanooga Railroad Company, as hereafter constructed, a post road, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 71) to further define and amend an act for the punishment of crimes against the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 72) to secure the speedy construction of the Union Pacific railroad, southern branch, and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 73) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the city of Lawrence, in the State of Kansas, to the boundary line between the United States and Mexico in the direction of the city of Guaymas, on the gulf of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 74) to promote greater efficiency in the postal service on the Pacific coast; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) to remit or refund duties on agricultural implements imported into the United States as models; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 32) refunding to the State of Indiana expenses incurred for quartermaster and commissary stores, and for transportation furnished to militia of said State while engaged in repelling rebel raids during the late rebellion; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

FEES OF CONSULAR AGENTS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State be directed severally to communicate to the Senate all information in the possession of either relative to the disposition made of that portion of fees received by consular agents within the districts of salaried consuls that have been by such consular agents paid over to such consuls under the apportionment of fees of such agents by the President; and whether any salaried consul now in office has been permitted to appropriate, or has appropriated to his own use, over and above the amount of his salary any portion of any such or any other fees, and if so, the name of the consul, and the amount he has been permitted to appropriate, or has appropriated, and under what regulation, if any, such appropriation has been authorized, and on what provision of law such regulation is founded.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL TENNESSEANS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I send to the Secretary's desk a resolution, which I ask to have read and adopted, referring a subject to the Committee on Claims.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of paying the loyal people of Tennessee for the commissary and quartermasters' stores taken and used by the Federal Army in that State during the late war, and to report a bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission, consisting of three gentlemen, one of whom at least shall be learned in the law, whose duty it shall be to investigate such claims for commissary and quartermasters' stores taken and used by the Federal Army during the late war as may be presented to them by the loyal people of Tennessee, and authorizing said commission to give vouchers for the same in all cases where such claims are found to be correct and just.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that a resolution instructing the committee so to report, or to inquire into the expediency of doing that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I understand it to be an instruction.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. No, sir; it merely instructs the committee to inquire into the expediency of doing this?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear the first part of the resolution read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of paying the loyal people of Tennessee for the commissary and quartermasters' stores taken and used by the Federal Army in that State during the late war, &c.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote of the Senate taken a few minutes ago agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. PATTERSON.] I have looked at the resolution, and, without intending it I dare say on the part of the Senator, it certainly contains an instruction to the committee to report a bill providing for the class of claims named, and therefore I think it ought to be reconsidered and changed; but as I see the Senator from Tennessee is absent at this moment from his seat, I will merely enter the motion to reconsider, and will call it up when he shall be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be so entered.

WITHDRAWAL OF LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. NORTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate under what authority the said Secretary, in December, 1864 and 1865, withdrew the public lands of the United States, situated between the cities of San Francisco and San José, in the State of California, and whether any reason exists why said lands should not be forthwith restored.

LIQUOR IN THE CAPITOL.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up for consideration the concurrent resolution to amend the nineteenth joint rule of the two Houses, reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in lieu of the joint resolution introduced by me to prevent the sale or use of liquors in the Capitol building.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to reconsider the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the nineteenth joint rule of the two Houses be amended so as to read as follows, namely:

No spirituous or malt liquors, or wines, shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto. And it shall be the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, under the supervision of the Presiding Officers thereof, respectively, to enforce the foregoing provisions. And any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate, or connive at the violation of this rule, shall be dismissed from office.

The resolution was adopted

AMERICAN ATLANTIC CABLE TELEGRAPH.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 28.

Mr. GRIMES. What is it?

Mr. RAMSEY. Simply granting to a New York telegraph company permission to lay their wires along the coast. It gives no exclusive privilege at all.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the reading of the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. "A bill (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company of New York the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe, via the Bermudas and Azores Islands."

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to vest the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company of New York with the right, power, and privilege to lay, land, and operate their cable or cables on the Atlantic coast, within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the period of twenty years from the approval of this act; but the company are to commence active operations within the space of two years. They are to have the right, power, and privilege to lay, land, and operate their cable or cables within any of the harbors, waters, inlets, towns, and cities on the Atlantic coast offering the most practical and convenient landing, and to construct or erect all the necessary fixtures to accomplish the object of the act. The Government of the United States is at all times to have the preference in its use, upon terms that may be agreed upon between the Postmaster General and the company.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with amendments, the first of which was in section one, line five, after the word "privilege" to insert "having acquired the necessary land therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line two, after the word "company" to insert "having acquired the necessary land therefor."

Mr. CONNESS. That is the same amendment as was made in the preceding section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the preamble of the bill, in the following words:

Whereas the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company of New York, organized and incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, for the purpose and intent to establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe, via Bermuda and Azores Islands; and whereas the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company desire the right of way and privilege to lay their cable or cables on the Atlantic coast of the United States: Therefore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know whether there is any particular information to be communicated upon this subject; what this company is; what they have done; and what the prospects of their accomplishing anything are? I should like to inquire further whether we have not granted an exclusive privilege of this sort to some company or other within a year or two for a given length of time. I forget what the name of the company was, but the matter was assiduously debated here, and the question of granting the exclusive privilege was debated. If that is so it may be interfered with by this bill. I hope the chairman of the committee will explain this bill, and let us know what this company is and what they design to do?

Mr. RAMSEY. This bill was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and there given as much consideration as the time of the committee would allow. We have been informed that this is an organized company of the city and State of New York, who desire no exclusive privilege, but simply the privilege to lay a second wire. We have one now to England, upon which the charges for communication are very onerous, and the public press and the people of the United States complain of it, and would like to see a rival company established. Inasmuch as these people ask no exclusive privileges the committee had no hesitation in according to them this bill, with the amendments such as they have submitted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire further whether the Senator has looked at the act passed a year or two ago granting the same privilege to another company, and whether that was not an exclusive privilege for a given length of time.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is the Havana line. I imagine they have an exclusive privilege in that direction. This is to be a European wire.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish the Senator would turn to that act, and let us see whether this would not be interfering with that.

Mr. RAMSEY. That does not touch Europe. That is a Cuba wire, and cannot conflict with this.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Still I think the privilege in that case was exclusive for the West India islands.

Mr. RAMSEY. Possibly it may be so; and, if it is so, the privileges granted to this company would be nugatory and amount to nothing. That is the worst that would happen; but inasmuch as these people ask for no exclusive privilege, I thought, and the committee thought, that the Senate should not hesitate to grant their request.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to see that act. I do not want to grant privileges that we have no authority to grant.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator will bear with us a moment, probably we can find that law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have some recollection of the act referred to, and this would undoubtedly fall within the terms of that act; that is to say, this company, by the terms of this bill, would be authorized to lay a line within the territory indicated by that act.

Mr. CONNESS. Has the Senator from Maine got the act?

Mr. RAMSEY. He has found it. It is on pages 47 and 48 of the laws of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That gives an exclusive privilege.

Mr. CONNESS. The exclusive privilege in that case relates to Florida.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then there should be an exception of the shores of Florida in this bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator from Maine insists upon it, and if there is any conflict, I will let the bill go over informally, and call it up again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You should except the shores of the State of Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over for the present by common consent.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 49) to repeal a joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland," approved January 29, 1867.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody, and the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 2) to authorize the refunding of discriminating duties exacted upon merchandise imported in Hawaiian vessels; and they were signed by the President pro tempore.

TREASURY PRINTING BUREAU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As there is nothing before the Senate, and the morning hour has very nearly expired, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 33, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration;" the pending question being upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.]

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to modify that amendment before it becomes the subject of discussion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to have the special committee provided for in the resolution that I offered day before yesterday to examine the Printing Bureau of the Treasury Department increased to five instead of three members.

Mr. SHERMAN. With regard to that committee a similar committee has been authorized by the House, and I think myself the committee should be a joint one. My attention has been called to the fact that committees are authorized to be appointed by each House to examine the same matter. If Congress deems this examination proper, it ought to be by a joint committee, and I trust the Senator will make it a joint committee. A member of the House the other day moved a resolution, which was adopted, on this same subject.

I desire to state further, to remove a public misapprehension in regard to the duplication of bonds, that a great many people, sometimes probably for speculative purposes, telegraph all over the country that large amounts of duplicated bonds and currency have been discovered. I am authorized to say that in no case has a duplication been discovered, but in some cases coupons of the same number have been presented, the principal of the bonds amounting in those cases probably to sixteen thousand dollars in all; that in every case they have been examined, and it was found to be in two cases a mistake in stamping the numbers upon the bonds; and no doubt nearly all the cases that have occurred of presumed duplication of bonds have been where the numbers have been erroneously stamped; for instance, two numbers stamped 264 instead of 264 and 265. That has been the result of the examination of the Treasury Department. However, it is perfectly proper that Congress should examine into this subject. It is a serious matter. If there is any ground for it, it ought to be thoroughly examined. I move, therefore, that the committee authorized by the resolution be a joint committee, and that the resolution be changed so as to provide for the appointment of a joint committee. The Secretary of the Treasury ought not to be bothered with two commissions of the two Houses on the same subject-matter. They ought to have one joint committee, and it ought to be carefully and minutely examined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) To carry out the object designed by the Senator from Ohio this should be made a concurrent resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will make that motion, that it be made a concurrent resolution, providing for a joint committee of three members of the Senate and five members of the House, if you choose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire if the House has not already passed a resolution appointing a separate committee on this subject?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but I propose that the two should unite together and act jointly; otherwise, there will be a separate examination by each House. It would be better to have one careful examination by a joint committee of both Houses.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But will not this result in having two committees, one concurrent, and one a committee of the House? That has been already appointed. I approve entirely of the Senator's idea. I only want to be certain that he reaches his object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so. At any rate, the House could reconsider its action and appoint the same gentlemen on this committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator to allow this matter to lie over informally until a conference can be had with the mover of the committee in the other House, else it seems to me it would look like action superseding their action, or there would be two committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the motion. The motion is that this committee act conjointly with a committee of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather the Senator from Missouri, who moved in the matter, would take his own course in regard to securing a joint committee instead of two several committees.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise simply to say that I was not aware that the House had taken any action on the subject when I offered this resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. It has not taken any action. A gentleman simply rose and proposed to offer a resolution; but objection was made, and the matter was carried over until to-day, as I understand.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then there is no objection to this action. If the House shall act on the subject and send us a resolution for a joint committee, I shall be perfectly willing to make the committee a joint one, and would prefer doing so. And in this connection permit me to say, if the public require to be comforted on this subject, that I offered the resolution without any idea of disturbing the public mind, without any information that ought to disturb the public mind; but it struck me that a vast concern of this sort ought to be repeatedly examined; and there is no harm in doing so. Another thing: if the examination of the Printing Bureau, that prints the entire public securities of the country, all the notes of every character now used as a circulating medium—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I must interpose an objection to going on with this discussion, the hour having arrived when the unfinished business of yesterday comes up for consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the committee will be made to consist of five members, and if the House sends us such a resolution as is suggested it can then be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the number of this committee be increased to five.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for the regular order of business. This discussion is only proceeding by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As this subject has been proceeded with by unanimous consent, it must be laid aside and the regular order of the day taken up on the call of any Senator.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 88) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration."

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to modify the amendment which I offered yesterday to the amendment of the committee, and which I believe is the first matter before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the Clerk to be so good as to modify it as I have directed, and let it come before the Senate in the modified shape in which, on the suggestion of several gentlemen, I have put it.

The Secretary read the amendment, as modified, which was to insert at the end of the fourth section of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary the following proviso:

Provided, That no such State constitution shall be considered as entitling the State for which it is framed to such representation unless it provide that in all elections by the people for State, county, or municipal officers the elector's vote shall be by ballot.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think in the tenth line of the fourth section of the amendment of the committee there should be inserted after the word "supplementary" these words, "and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with." I move that amendment. Those words are in the House bill I will state, but they are omitted in this section of the Senate bill. The necessity for inserting them is this: if the members of the Senate have the bill before them they will see that the clause reads, beginning at the eighth line—

And if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, &c.

Now, something more than the fact that the Constitution is in accordance with the bill to which this is supplementary is requisite; for instance, the constitutional amendment must have been ratified, and it is necessary to put in these words which were in the House bill, so as to declare, not only that the Constitution which is framed must be in accordance with the act to which this is supplementary, but also that the other provisions of that act shall have been complied with. I presume there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire if we had not better use the words "and the constitutions approved." That is the language of the original act. One of the provisions, and a very important and essential provision in that act, was that the constitution should be approved by Congress. Now this leaves out that and says simply if the constitution "shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary."

Mr. TRUMBULL. "And the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with." I propose to insert those words.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Would that cover as much as the words "and the constitutions approved by Congress?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. "And the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with."

Mr. FESSENDEN. "And the said constitutions shall be approved by Congress." I want those words in, because the reason why they were in the other bill was that we might retain our power, not knowing what sort of a constitution they would present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Would the "other provisions of said act" be complied with if the constitution was not approved by Congress?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would hardly perhaps be called a provision of the act, being something that must be done finally. I would rather those words be retained, because it was an essential idea that after all, although the constitution might contain the provisions specified, it might contain something else that would prevent its being approved by Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator look at it more closely? He will see in the tenth line the words "the State shall be declared entitled to representation." Declared by whom? By Congress. We have to act upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "And if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, the State shall be declared entitled to representation."

Mr. TRUMBULL. And now I propose to put in the words which will be found in the eleventh and twelfth lines of the fifth section of the House bill on page 4, "and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to add there "and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no particular objection to those words.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are in the original act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to putting in those words; they will follow the words I have proposed; and I accept them if they will avoid any controversy, though I think the object is fully covered by the other words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be modified as he proposes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume there will be no objection to this amendment, though I do not offer it from the committee. I did not observe that these words were out. I presume there is no objection from any quarter to inserting them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now propose to offer an amendment covering the idea which I suggested yesterday in the few remarks I made on this subject. First, I move to strike out, in the first section of the substitute of the committee, all down to and including the word "entitled," in the fifth line, and in lieu of those words to insert "that before a convention shall be holden for the purpose of framing a State constitution under and by virtue of," and then after "1867," in line seven, to insert "commanding general in each district defined in said act;" so that the section will read thus:

That before a convention shall be holden for the purpose of framing a State constitution under and by virtue of an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, passed March 2, 1867, the commanding general in each district defined in said act shall cause a registration to be made, &c.

Then I have another amendment to propose to the second section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose it is best to take the question on each amendment by itself.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to hear them all, to see how they bear on each other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will send the other amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the first section of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that amendment will not be adopted. I think we leave quite discretion enough to the commanding general. The effect of this amendment is to leave it entirely optional with him to make the registration or not. Now, sir, I understand the object of the legislation passed at the last session of Congress and the object of this bill is to afford to these people the means of forming a constitution and State government and resuming their position in the Union.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The objection which the Senator makes did not occur to me, and I am perfectly willing to leave in the words requiring a registration to be made before the last day of September, 1867.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then if the Senator so modifies his amendment will be good enough to tell me how the section, if amended as he proposes, will differ from the section as it now stands?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that it will change it really. I drafted the amendment to this section with reference to the next amendment, which I should like to have read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it makes no difference, except in phraseology simply, it is hardly worth while to have any discussion about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not so particular about that, but my object was to negative the idea that a convention could be held before the registration was made. I desired to have it distinctly declared that no convention should be held until after the registration was completed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is so as the section stands now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the other amendment which I sent to the desk be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that is read, perhaps we shall understand the question better.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment of Mr. FESSENDEN, which was to strike out in section two of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary all after the word "State," in line two, down to and including the word "Union" in line seven, and in lieu of those words to insert:

The commanding general shall furnish a certified copy thereof to the provisional governor of the State for which the same was made; and whenever thereafter the provisional government of said State shall by legal enactment provide that a convention shall be called for the purpose of framing a State constitution and establishing civil government, and shall furnish the commanding general with a duly authenticated copy of such act, the commanding general shall direct that an election of delegates to such convention shall be held at such time and place as he shall appoint and direct, of which at least—day's notice shall be given in such manner as the commanding general shall determine.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now see what the design of the Senator is. The amendments in the first section, as he proposes them, do not alter its meaning, as I think, at all, but are mere matters of phraseology, about which I shall make no remark, as he has now modified them; but the amendment proposed to the second section, if I understand its purport—and if I do not the Senator will correct me—is to prevent any action being taken in any of these States for the purpose of forming a constitution and government in accordance with the act of the last session until the present governments in those States, provisional as they are called, shall have given their sanction and expressed their wish for the formation of such a constitution and government. That is the whole purport of it, as I understand. I am opposed to such an amendment as that for various reasons.

In the first place, I am not for continuing the loyal people of the rebel States under the control of those disloyal governments. This would leave the loyal element in all those States at the mercy indefinitely of the disloyal governments which have been organized there. Now, what is the complaint in regard to the governments which have been set up in the rebel States? Is it not that they are in the hands of disloyal men, that they are oppressive upon Union men, that they are unjust to the freedmen, that they do not afford the requisite protection for life and property? And are we to leave these people at the mercy of these rebel governments? Why, sir, it was for the very purpose of taking the control of those States out of the hands of those men that I voted for the bill of the last session, and I am unwilling to leave it at the mercy of those rebel governments.

Then again, sir, the object of this legislation, as I understand, is to afford a means by which the people of these States may organize governments upon a loyal basis and resume their position in the Union as members of the Union. I, for one, desire that, and I desire that at the earliest practicable period when it can be done with safety to the Union, and when State governments can be organized upon loyal principles and in accordance with the Constitution as it has been amended and the provisions of the act which we have passed.

I am unwilling entirely to leave it to these governments, which we have declared not to be legal governments, to determine this question. Why, sir, how were those governments got up? They were got up by the rebel element and under the control of the rebel element. That has been our complaint. In some remarks made by the Senator from Maine yesterday he expressed himself as opposed to forcing upon the people of any of these States a constitution. So am I. He is opposed to forcing them into the formation of a State government. So am I; and this bill proposes no such thing: it proposes to leave it to the registered voters, excluding certain leading rebels who are not to be registered, to determine through the delegates they shall elect to the convention whether they will form a constitution and State government in accordance with our legislation. Is there any force in this? It proposes to leave to those same voters after the constitution shall have been formed the power to decide whether they will adopt that constitution and form of government or not.

The whole object of the bill is to afford facilities to the people to give expression to their opinions. The object of this supplementary bill is to direct somebody to set the machinery in motion. What was the objection to the legislation of the last Congress? What was the defect in the law which it is now designed to remedy? The complaint was that it made no provision for inaugurating the necessary proceedings for carrying it into effect. It was said that in some of the States a political party, perhaps, would undertake to get up a State government in accordance with that bill; another effort might be made to get up a State government under the action of the provisional government, as the Senator from Maine now proposes, for if his amendment prevails no step can be taken in the formation of a State government until this provisional government inaugurated by and in the hands of the rebel element shall give it its sanction. I deny that these provisional governments represent the people in these States; they represent but a part of them. The Senator said yesterday that this legislation of ours was obnoxious to the same objection that had been made to the action of the President; that we complained of the President as guilty of usurpation in inaugurating the governments which now exist in the rebellious States. That is true; but we complained of that because he had no authority to do it; it was a usurpation on his part; but it is not a usurpation on the part of Congress, because Congress has the constitutional authority to move in this matter.

But usurpation or not usurpation on the part of the President, it would never have been a question of any material importance to me how the government was inaugurated in any of these rebellious States provided it had been inaugurated with the assent of the people—that is the substance of the thing—and had been loyal and in the hands of loyal men and protected loyal men and freedmen, in accordance with the Constitution and the present principles obtaining in the Government. That is what I want. The object of this bill is to afford the machinery and prevent collision in arriving at the formation of such a government. There is no force about it. I do not believe in forcing a government upon any of those States, any more than the Senator from Maine; and that is not the bill. I think it should be left to the people to determine, as was said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] yesterday. It is true I did not vote for his amendment, because I thought we reached that point by the bill as it was; but the last thing I would do would be to leave it to these governments, which we have declared to be illegal governments, to determine that question. I trust the amendment may not be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a sufficient answer to the last remark of the Senator, that we have declared these governments to be illegal, to say that we have declared them to be legal. We have declared them to be illegal as State governments, but we have legalized them as provisional governments expressly by the bill which we passed at the last session, and we have given the right to the commanding general to avail himself of them so far as may be necessary, in his judgment, to that end or to any other end as existing legal provisional governments in those States.

Now, sir, I do not precisely agree with my friend from Illinois in his view with regard to this matter. The object of forming these State governments is not, as I understand it, to give protection to the loyal people there. That object is accomplished by the mode provided in the bill which we have passed, and that is by organizing military governments there for the purpose of protecting those people, and with full authority to do so. So far, therefore, as the protection of the loyal people in all their rights and privileges is concerned, we have given them the most efficient protection by putting them under the protection of the military. The object of this movement, as I understand it, is to provide a mode in which State governments may be formed, if it is considered desirable on the part of the people of those States to frame State governments at all. That was the object of the bill we passed at the last session; and the object of this I understand to be to protect the people in the details necessary to accomplish that purpose, to protect them in their right of suffrage and all their rights that are essential to free action in relation to that matter.

Now, sir, what complaint do we have to meet? I take it that the great complaint which has been made there and here on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the House by our adversaries, and elsewhere, is that we do not desire that these people shall come back into the Union at all, that we are contriving modes to keep them out of the Union. That has been the Democratic cry against us from the beginning. Now, here are provisional governments in these States which represent the very people who are making this cry and who are the particular friends as we understand of those who are opposed to the Union party here. My object is simply that these organized governments, provisional governments, chosen by the people there—not by all the people to be sure, and partaking of the character which my friend assigns to them—being composed of men who by themselves and their friends here and elsewhere have made the complaint, shall be told, "We now give you the opportunity to frame a State constitution and to establish State institutions; we present them to you; if you desire it, signify it; you who have complained; you who pretend that you want to come back into the Union; you who say you are kept out; we wish to give you the opportunity to decide that question for yourselves. You have got a provisional government framed in all the forms of government, a Governor and a Legislature elected by yourselves; you have made this complaint; you say that you are unreasonably kept out of connection with the Government of the United States. Now, then, you are the organs of the people; if you wish to have a State constitution and establish State institutions you have the power to say so; make it manifest by legal enactment; express your will, and when you have done so, if you desire it, we stand ready to afford you all the opportunities to do it fairly and freely under the act that we have passed; we take the control of the details of the preliminary proceedings, because we can do it more to our satisfaction and to the security of the whole people than we think you will do it; and therefore as to the details we carry them into effect; but it is for you to say whether you wish a State government or not, and henceforth if you do not say so make no complaint about it."

These provisional governments represent the people of those States, or if they do not they soon will. We have provided in the same act that in all elections hereafter to be held all males who have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, white and black, shall have the right to vote. The men now holding power in these governments that have been formed, which call themselves State governments, and which we have recognized as provisional governments, have been elected only for a time; their terms will expire; and if the present provisional governments selected by a portion of the people, as the Senator from Illinois says, do not choose to ask for a State constitution very soon, the people of those States and all the people of those States will be entitled in any event to elect new members, and if the public sentiment there is for a convention to frame a constitution they can then express it in a legal and proper way.

My simple purpose is that the very men who have made these complaints against us, and who now form the governments recognized by us and legalized by us, should have the power to decide whether or not they wish to frame a regular State constitution and come back to the Union. If I believed, or if I understood, as the Senator from Illinois does, that the object of this measure is to afford protection to those who have not got it now, that would be another thing; but we have done all that we judged to be necessary for the protection of the Union people, white and black, in those States by the bill which we have passed, and they are safe, as we understand, under the shadow of the military.

I do not know that my views will commend themselves to any other member of the Senate besides myself; but entertaining them very decidedly as to what is the most advisable method of deciding the question originally whether a convention shall be called or not, I have thought it my duty to move these amendments, and they are before the Senate for its action. I repeat that while I am as anxious as anybody that these States shall be back in full communion with us as soon as possible, I do not want them back a moment sooner than they are prepared to come with the right kind of feeling to do their duty by the whole people of the United States. And, sir, by—I use the word again—forcing them, by taking the matter into our own hands and deciding whether a convention shall be called in the first place, taking it out of the hands of the people of the States in fact, no matter if we do leave it to them to decide whether the constitution that may be framed by the convention is satisfactory to them or not afterward; but by taking it out of their hands entirely to decide the question originally whether they desire a convention or not, we expose ourselves to all the disadvantages of which I spoke yesterday. They may turn around and say to us that they did not desire to come; that they have been forced back; that they do not thank us for forcing that question upon their consideration; it should be left to them. Although it is not a usurpation in us to do it—I do not pretend to say that it is—yet I do say that when we send the military there for the protection of the people, it is not, in my judgment, any of their business to decide in the first place whether a convention shall be called to frame a constitution. That is not for the military; but we may safely and properly say that the military are, if that question is decided upon, to see to the details and to take care that the whole matter is properly done.

But, sir, I will not elaborate upon this question. I have stated the general views I have. My amendments are before the Senate, and the Senate will judge of them.

Mr. HENDERSON. When the Senator from Maine yesterday first suggested this amendment it struck me that it was a proper amendment, and I thought at the time I would favor it upon the ground so very ably presented by himself, that the southern States hereafter should not be permitted to charge that they had been forced back into the Union against their consent; that we should make it obligatory on them in some way to express their desire to return. When my colleague first offered his amendment yesterday, which caused the Senator from Maine to make the remark that he intended to offer this proposition, it struck me favorably also. My reason for voting against my colleague's amendment will induce me to vote against the proposition now presented. In a certain view of the case that amendment of my colleague is correct; but it will be observed, by an examination of this bill, that the bill itself in the particular of obtaining the consent of the qualified voters upon this subject departs from the act we originally passed. Senators will see by examining the fifth section of the act of last session that we only required that the constitution, when submitted to the vote of the people, should be ratified by a majority of those voting. That is not the bill now before us. This bill goes further than that, and requires not only a majority of all those who may see fit to vote, but a majority of all the legally qualified voters according to the registration.

There are two guarantees provided in this bill for obtaining the consent of the people of the State preparatory to its admission; that is, to obtain evidence that the State desires to return to the Union. First, it is necessary that the delegates elected, when they come into convention, shall declare by a vote that "it is the wish of the people of such State to frame a constitution and civil government;" and after they shall have adopted a constitution it is to be submitted to the people, and not voted upon favorably by a mere majority of those voting, but by a majority of all the qualified voters as returned upon the registry. The fourth section of the bill now pending before us declares that—

If according to said returns the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, &c.

It will be observed that we not only have the guarantee of the members of the convention that it is the desire of the people to return—those members being fresh from the people, just having received their votes, and having themselves assembled for the purpose of making a constitution preparatory to admission—but the bill departs entirely from the original reconstruction law which we passed. The Senator from Maine will discover that the fifth section of that law only requires a majority of those voting to approve the constitution; and if the bill now before us followed the original act in that respect his amendments would be altogether proper, or some measure of a similar character seeking to put the burden upon them of declaring their wish in some way to return.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator whether we can with propriety depart from the provisions of the original act in that regard? We agreed and stated to them that if they would adopt certain provisions in a certain way they would be received on the terms specified. Ought we now to make a departure from what we originally proposed? My friend from Massachusetts, who originally introduced this bill, thinks the bill weakened by that change, and that it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I very frankly say that it is a departure, and in that respect it may be worse. I do not pretend to determine that question; but I would suggest to the Senator that that provision is in the bill, and if it is to remain in the bill it secures the object that he contemplates by his amendment; and it seems to me that it secures it in a better mode than the mode adopted by himself, because the objection urged by the Senator from Illinois is certainly a very strong one, that, so far as Congress is concerned, we have at all times taken the ground that these provisional governments are void, and that we are under no obligation whatever to regard their acts. In the bill we passed a few days since we took occasion by an amendment to it, made in the House and agreed to by the Senate, to declare that those governments were provisional in their nature, and we took it upon ourselves to prescribe the qualifications of all voters that might hereafter vote under those governments. But the Senator will discover that without an election with the qualifications of voters prescribed as we desire, he leaves it entirely with those governments to determine whether there shall be any affirmative action or not. Suppose that in one of the States a majority of all the people, counting the negroes and white Union men, should be in favor of the State returning to the Union, they cannot, under this amendment, return, unless with the consent of the provisional government of the State. Certainly these provisional governments are in the hands of men who fought against us. I will not say that they are disloyal now; but they certainly were disloyal; and the members of those Legislatures were unquestionably elected by men who fought in the confederate armies, and a large majority of the voters were composed of that class of men. This amendment puts it in the power of the disloyal in these respective States to exclude from the polls the loyal men whom we have qualified to vote under the previous law, bringing in three eighths of the qualified voters by virtue of that bill. I mean the negroes, who had no voice in the election of the men whom it is now proposed to invest with the power of deciding whether or not a convention shall be called.

It struck me very favorably when presented yesterday; but on reconsideration I am inclined to think that it will work badly; and that we ought not to adopt it, and especially if the provision that a majority of all the qualified voters shall determine in favor of the constitution before it shall be adopted is to be retained in the bills. That secures all that the Senator from Maine can desire. It secures what I consider, and what he seems to consider, a very important requirement—a demonstration that a majority of the people qualified under this act wish to return. To ask that the present provisional government should express that wish does not determine the fact that a majority of those whom we have qualified to vote are in favor of returning. In that view, until I know whether the Senator will retain this departure from the original bill, I must oppose the proposition of the Senator from Maine, upon the very same reason that I opposed the proposition of my colleague yesterday.

The Senator from Maine asks whether we are not in honor bound to stand by the original proposition. I do not think so. Although I intend to favor this bill, and desire the speedy return of these States, I do not think we are obliged to stand by the proposition that was made a few days ago. We can supply other terms, and I think the Senator from Maine has had a very important requirement added this morning, lest the argument of estoppel should be brought against us when these constitutions are brought here, and it be said that we are bound to accept them, that we shall not be allowed to consider the matter at that time. He offered a very important amendment a few moments ago, that the State constitution must not only be in accordance with the terms of the original proposition and in accordance with this act, but that it must be approved by Congress before representatives from these States are admitted. That leaves it entirely in our hands, when they present themselves here, to determine whether they have violated any of the provisions of these acts or whether there is something in their respective constitutions that we do not then like. Whether I shall feel called upon at that time to cast my vote against the admission of any members from these States or not, after the States shall have strictly complied with this law, is another question. I wish to reserve to myself the right at that time to say yea or nay. I am not bound by any act of Congress already passed, nor by any act that shall be passed to-day, nor by any act which may be passed during the present session of Congress or any other session, so as to be utterly unable to consider their constitutions when they present themselves.

Entertaining these views, I think the amendment of the Senator from Maine ought not to be adopted, at least until it is determined whether a full majority of the registered voters shall be required for the ratification of the constitution or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been suggested to me that it is understood from the reading of my amendment that it leaves it to the provisional governments to decide upon the whole thing and to conduct the details. That is not so. There is nothing in the world by my amendment left to the provisional government but to decide whether or not they want a convention to frame a constitution. If they decide in favor of it, all the details are to be conducted by the military authorities according to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will be so if your amendment is adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. My view of the practical operation of this amendment is that if adopted we should be justly charged with having passed an act which, whether we intended it or not, would amount to practical obstruction. I desire to call the especial attention of the Senator from Maine to the practical operation of it if passed. In the first place, the legislation which we have passed, taken in connection with the constitutional amendment, probably disfranchises one half or perhaps three fourths of the members of the existing Legislatures in the rebellious States, and those now controlling the governments there. Our legislation disfranchises them during the present organization, and the constitutional amendment excludes them from office when the States shall have been restored to representation. Now, this amendment is saying to the rebels who are in the Legislatures, "We will exclude you from office, we will disfranchise you, and we will give you the power to say whether you will be excluded alone or whether you will take with you all the Union men of your States." It places it in the power of the President of the United States, who is supposed to be acting in harmony with these very men, to advise them to obstruct the congressional plan. It takes from the people who are allowed to vote and be registered under this bill the right to determine the question of restoration. It places it out of the power of the Union party or the friends of the Union to have any say in this question of restoration. I do not know but that after we have disfranchised these rebels they may be a little desperate, and want to keep their neighbors in the same situation. It seems to me that it would be rather natural on any of them, if they came in on equal terms with their neighbors, they might deal fairly and justly with this question; but inasmuch as they are not to participate in the Government they may desire that their States should remain in their present condition, hoping for a reaction in the North; but the mass of the people of the South, those who were not leaders, those who are to be restored, have waited for that reaction as long as they propose to wait, and if you give the people of the South a chance they will act in favor of restoration. If you give disfranchised rebels the power to say how long this Union shall remain unrestored, I think perhaps they will say "always," for the restoration of the Union does not bring office to them. We have determined to make a discrimination between the leading rebels and the people; and having determined that, it is now proposed to say that the leading rebels shall determine for the people, and not the people for themselves, whether the people shall have representation in Congress.

If, after having legislated in such a manner as to disfranchise them, you say to them, "You may keep the State out as long as you please," I think we should be justly chargeable with contriving legislation which was calculated to postpone restoration. They would act just as we see a factious minority acting everywhere. They would want to make the situation as bad as possible. They would want to keep the people out just as long as possible. They would want everybody in as bad a situation as themselves. Then what would be the chance of restoration? First we must ask permission of the leading rebels. We say to the leading rebels, "You shall not be restored, but we submit to you to decide when the others shall be restored, whether you will stand alone or whether you will have millions at your back; we will not restore you; we will keep you disfranchised, and then allow you to keep disfranchised with you ten million people, and to have so much influence to sustain you in making a solid column of the whole South, and have them at your back to aid you in breaking up the Government." Why not allow the people to leave these leaders, enfranchise the people, and leave these rebel leaders in a hopeless minority. If the proposition were presented in that shape, what rebel would not say, "I will keep the South a unit; I will keep the South out; I will have the South stand together until the North is weary, until there is some reaction, and then they will let us in en masse or let us go?" Would he not say, "I will live under military rule until the North changes its opinion, until some financial crash comes; I will have hope as long as I have ten million people in the same box with me, for they cannot be permanently disfranchised?"

I will not vote to place the loyal people of the South under subjection to the rebels, and that is the practical operation of this amendment. As I remarked yesterday, the bill is already sufficiently dilatory in its provisions. It submits it to the people, in the first place, to elect delegates to meet in convention, and those delegates when they meet are to decide whether it is the wish of the people to have a State constitution formed. If a constitution is formed it is finally to be submitted to the voters; and unless a majority of all the voters registered vote in its favor it is not to be adopted. That election is to be on the simple question of the constitution without any other issue, without there being candidates in the field; and of course, therefore, it will be impossible to get all the people out to vote. If you get a two-thirds vote or half a full vote at such an election you will be doing well. But you must not only get one half of the people out to vote, but more than one half the people must vote for the proposition. Then there must be an overwhelming sentiment among the loyal people and among those who are not disfranchised by your bill, there must be an extraordinary unanimity before there can be a reconstruction under this bill as it stands, allowing the people to determine the question; but as long as the bill consults the voters, the people, let it stand as it is; but when it is proposed that the rebels who are to be disfranchised shall determine this question, when you place it in their power, I say it is practical obstruction.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Maine. I regretted very much that the amendment of the honorable Senator from Missouri, offered by him yesterday, was lost; and the more I have thought of the subject the better I have been satisfied as to the expediency of that provision, if it had been carried. What we wish, at least what I wish particularly, is to obtain an authentic expression of the people of the various rebel States upon the question of their willingness to come back into the Union, so to speak, and to enjoy the rights and privileges of States of the Union.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not see any necessity for an interpolation.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to be enlightened by the Senator's opinion.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, sir, I will hear the question.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether, in his conviction, the present rebel governments of those States do reflect the sentiment of the people?

Mr. HOWARD. I am by no means sure that they do not reflect the sentiments of the people. If they do reflect the sentiments of the people, and the people are as disloyal and as hostile to the Government of the United States as their Legislatures appear to be, I for one am free to say that I will not vote to restore them to the Union.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the Senator entertains the opinion that all that large mass of people upon whom Congress has conferred the elective franchise are hostile to the Government. As a matter of course if those governments reflect the sentiments of the people of those States, of the majority of the people of those States, as the colored population are in some of those States in the ascendancy, there must be a large proportion of that class of people hostile to the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know how the fact may be in some localities; it is very possible that the Senator from Iowa may be correct as to certain localities, but I speak of the great mass of them. For one I will not consent to readmit into Congress Senators and Representatives whose constituencies at home are hostile to the maintenance and support of the Government of the United States, let their professions be whatever they may, and let their color be whatever it may. I do not believe in allowing traitors and traitor constituencies to be again in the enjoyment of the privileges granted by the Constitution of the United States. I am not in such hot haste as to restore the Union, as it is often said, upon principles of disloyalty and rebelism.

Now, sir, there is much force, in my opinion, in what the honorable Senator from Maine has said in regard to taking the opinion of the rebel provisional Legislatures. They have been elected by usurpation and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, by rebel constituencies, and they represent, so far as they possibly can do so, the interests, the feelings, the prejudices, and the malignity of unrepentant rebel communities. Before we admit them to a participation in the Government of the United States I wish to see these same Legislatures, humiliating as it may be to their pride, and the more humiliating the better, brought down to the stool of repentance, and made to see the error of their ways, and to give their consent freely again to reënter the Union and do their duty as citizens of the United States.

But some of our friends see, or think they see, in this proposition a result which will be unfavorable to the Union element in the rebel States. They ask us why we would appeal to the provisional Legislatures to decide the question of calling a convention to reform their constitutions, and why we would in the mean time permit these provisional Legislatures to exercise uncontrolled power over the Unionists of the South; in other words, why we will permit the Union element to be subjected to the oppression, the injustice, and the insults which flow from such a source. There possibly may be some force in this objection; but I do not think it sufficiently weighty to induce me to vote for the immediate calling of a convention by military authority or by the authority of Congress, and thus establishing a State government to which the mass of them possibly may be opposed.

How will the matter stand in case the amendment of the honorable Senator from Maine is adopted? What will be the character of the constituency to whom these provisional Legislatures will be and must be responsible? In the first place, there is to be a registration of all the male people of the State above twenty-one years of age, and every man who is thus registered has to take the oath prescribed in this bill; that is to say, he is to swear, according to the frame of the bill, that he is not excluded from the right to vote by the fifth and sixth sections of the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States; that he will support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will to the best of his ability encourage all others to do the same; so help him God. The whole voting constituency are to take this oath before any one of them is entitled to registration under the act, and after this registration is made the commanding general is to present a copy of it to the provisional governor of the State, who is to lay it before the provisional legislature for their action. Thus that legislature will become completely informed of the number of their constituents who have taken the oath of allegiance, so to speak, to the United States. They will know how many citizens of the State are prepared to emerge from a provisional government and enter into a regularly formed State government. It is very likely that a large proportion of the people of the rebel States will be thus registered. I presume that nine tenths of the whole male population will thus be registered; and the very fact of their taking this oath and becoming registered is a guarantee, will be construed as a guarantee to the United States and to their provisional governments, that they are anxious to throw off the provisional form and enter upon the regular form of State governments.

Now, sir, I wish to have these provisional Legislatures understand all these facts. I wish the fact of a large majority of their own constituents being in favor of a regular State government to be brought to their notice and knowledge; and then after they see this, and see that there is a large proportion of the people in favor of a State government, let them, if they dare, take upon themselves the responsibility of refusing to call a convention. Sir, I do not know what material they may be made of; but if they are composed of the ordinary material with which I am acquainted in this country, you could hardly anticipate that a southern provisional legislature, with such a showing before them, would refuse to proceed and call a convention. If they chose, however, to do so, if they chose to exercise the unjust and despotic authority with which they are now invested, it would only institute among the friends of readmission and the enemies of readmission in their own midst discussion which could not fail to result, and within some very short time, in the total overthrow of the secession party, and their expulsion from power at their domestic firesides.

I am, sir, in short, for taking every precaution that is practicable to obtain a free and full expression of the southern communities upon the great, fundamental, and elementary question of returning peaceably back into the Union and discharging their duties as States. If the mass of them are prepared to do this now, and furnish satisfactory evidence that they will behave themselves in future, I am willing to readmit them; but I am not in haste for it. They took their own time to get out of the Union; let them take their own time to return. They took their own time to initiate the war; we took our own time to close the war. We are under no obligations to them. We do not propose to place ourselves under any obligations to them. They complain of coercion; they complain of injustice because we coerced them to lay down their arms. They complain of injustice because we do not readmit them, as they say, to their constitutional rights. We have now, for the first time in our history, proposed terms of reconciliation and readmission. Let them freely act upon it; let them accept or reject those terms, as they may prefer. If their interest, in their opinion, consists in rejecting our terms, let them stay out in the cold and cease to have any participation in the Government of the United States. But at all events, I am not for hastening them back into the Union contrary to the consent of a majority of their people, for a government founded upon the will merely of a minority of the people is no government at all; it cannot maintain itself for a twelvemonth in the face of an active and vigorous majority; it must necessarily be overthrown. A government by a minority is but another name for despotism.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is it not a fact, a well-known fact, that a large portion of the members of the existing Legislatures at the South are excluded from holding office under the constitutional amendment, and excluded from voting under this bill? And is it not submitting it to a minority when you submit the question to the excluded class, whether they, being excluded in any event from participation in the Government, will or will not allow the majority of the people to be represented in Congress? Are you not submitting it, not only to a minority, but a bad minority, when you submit it to those Legislatures? They are an excluded class, who are not to be restored to their relations to the Union and to holding office; and yet you propose to leave it to them to decide whether the majority shall be represented or not.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know how the fact may be in regard to the loyalty and eligibility of a majority of the members of their State Legislatures. I have never inquired into it. Undoubtedly there may be some members of their State Legislatures who will be proscribed by the fourteenth article of the Amendments to the Constitution. That we cannot help. Let them, if they dare, set themselves up against the manifest wishes of a majority of their own people, and how long will they maintain themselves? It will not be long before the voice of the majority will be the ruling and controlling power.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire how the voice of the majority can be heard when you say it shall not be heard unless rebels will let them speak. No convention can be called, no voting can be done, unless the provisional Legislature say so. You put it in their power to stop the mouths of the people, and to keep them under your military rule, without letting them be heard. They cannot vote except by permission of the rebel Legislatures.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Nevada seems to talk as if the present members of the rebel State Legislatures are to remain in office for life. Is that so? Does he not know that their terms of office expire annually, and in all cases biennially at farthest? This state of things can endure but for a few months at farthest, and then a majority of the legal voters of the State will revolutionize even the very provisional governments, and thus their voice will become potential and final. I hope, therefore, that if we are unable finally to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, we shall at least grasp at the security which is offered by the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

I do not, I confess, exactly coincide with the spirit of this bill when it declares that—

After the completion of the registration hereby provided for in any State, at such time and places therein as the commanding general shall appoint and direct, of which at least thirty days public notice shall be given, an election shall be held of delegates to a convention.

It leaves the whole thing, entirely and absolutely, unconditionally in the hands of the commanding military gentleman. It is for him, according to the bill, not for the provisional government, not for the people themselves, to pass upon the question of ordering an election for a convention. No, sir, it is not even for him to exercise any discretion over that subject, because by the bill itself we command him, we utter a command which he must obey, to issue his notice for calling a convention. That forces him to it without reference to the will or wishes of the people or of their representatives even in their bogus Legislatures. Is this fair? Suppose they do not want any convention, suppose they do not want to come back into the Union, shall we force them into the Union? That is a bad operation. You may lead a horse to the spring to drink, and you may persuade him and entice him by all the means in your power to swallow the water; but if he is indisposed to drink you cannot force him. It will be so with these rebels. If they are willing they will say so, and they will come back. If they are unwilling, we do not want them back; at least I do not for one. I want no members of the House of Representatives or of the Senate of the United States who are unfriendly to the maintenance of the Government of the United States, none who will seize upon the first opportunity to enter into another conspiracy for its overthrow. I want to see no members here or in the other House who are not heart and soul in favor of the preservation and maintenance of the Government of the United States as such; and I shall esteem it a calamity to see any man admitted to these seats who was unfriendly to that object. That is an object which we say is the paramount object, which is ever to be before our eyes, never to be lost sight of. We may differ in opinion as to measures, as to the mode of administration, as to the character of men, the character of officers; but men who profess to be true to the Union have no difference of opinion as to the propriety and necessity of adhering to it and maintaining it through weal and woe. I fear that there may be too many at this day in the South who would be willing to lend their aid in its destruction and overthrow.

The Senator from Illinois seems to think that we have sufficient security in the bill itself that no southern State will reorganize its State governments without the voice of a majority of the people. I do not understand the bill in this way. According to his scheme there are to be elected, under the order of the military commandant, delegates to a convention to frame a constitution. Those delegates as he knows very well from the terms of his bill, may be elected by a minority of the voters of the State. The bill does not require that even a majority of the registered votes of the State shall be given at that election. They may be all elected by a hundred or a thousand votes, while twenty thousand or forty thousand voters may remain at home. And after the convention is thus elected, the bill provides that its first duty shall be to "determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of such State to form a constitution and civil government according to the provisions of this act and the act to which it is supplementary." Thus the entire popular expression upon that, the most momentous question which can be conceived, is the voice of the members of the convention who may or may not, as the case may be, represent a majority of the voters of the State. Sir, that is not a fair and ample expression of popular opinion according to my view, and I much prefer either the amendment of the Senator from Missouri or the amendment of the Senator from Maine, so far as the expression of popular opinion is concerned, to the bill itself.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in the spring of 1865 the rebel cause went down, and in a few months the President of the United States permitted the rebels to use the machinery of their old governments, shut out two fifths of their population from any rights whatever, and to take possession and control of those States. They did it, and those States are in their possession. The rebels have possession of all the State governments with the exception of the Executives of Virginia, of Arkansas, and of Louisiana, Governors elected before the close of the war; but the Legislatures of those States are in rebel hands.

The other day we laid down the terms and conditions of restoration. We dictated terms and conditions as absolute as conquerors ever dictated; full and complete terms. At the time we did it everybody said here that the principles avowed in that act, the declarations there made, the conditions there laid down, were all right, but the practical mode to carry them out was wanting. That was the declaration in Congress and out of Congress. This supplementary bill was framed and introduced for the purpose of supplying that defect by providing a practical mode of carrying into effect the act of last session. Two amendments have been made by the House of Representatives to the original bill, which I think weaken the Union cause and our cause; and the Judiciary Committee have adopted another amendment, which I think weakens it in another direction. The effect of this amendment must be to continue or increase the power of the rebels who are in possession of the present governments, and to weaken our friends.

The population of the ten rebel States amounts to about eight million; four million six hundred thousand are white, and three million three hundred and sixty thousand are colored. Estimating the voters as one fifth of the population, there are nine hundred and twenty-three thousand white voters, and six hundred and seventy-two thousand colored voters; leaving a majority in those States of only a quarter of a million white voters. We have clothed the colored men with the right of suffrage, and they have majorities in many of these States. There are thousands of loyal white men who were loyal all through the war; there are tens of thousands of men who were somehow or other compromised by the rebellion, who cannot take the oath of office, but who were against the rebellion and against the men who led them into the rebellion; who are for the Union, for the Constitution, for the old flag, ready to work for it, vote for it, and fight for it; men who are in political sympathy with a majority in both Chambers of Congress. We propose simply not to ask rebel Governors, not to ask rebel Legislatures, put in power by the consent of the President, to have anything to say or do about it. We do propose to ask the people themselves; propose to ask not the Governor of South Carolina, not the Legislature of South Carolina, but the people of South Carolina, where the colored population outnumber the whites by one hundred and twenty thousand, and where they have a majority of twenty-five thousand voters, to co-operate with us in the work of restoration. It is now proposed by this singular amendment not to give them the privilege, but to ask the consent of the rebel Legislature, and unless that Legislature consents to let them vote, to keep them out. Just so it is in Mississippi and Louisiana and Alabama. A majority in these States can be carried as easily for the Union as we can carry the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania; and not only for the Union, but for candidates for Congress who will come here and vote as we vote, speak as we speak, and think as we think, if we will permit them to do it.

This bill was intended by me to put aside the rebel leaders and rebel Governors and Legislatures; to make them "take back seats;"

to bring the loyal men, the true Union white men and the black men whom we have enfranchised, into the front seats. Let them frame constitutions to secure their rights, and send representatives here who can take the oath and who can take part with us in the government of the country. That is the original bill, and that is its purpose. With the exercise of practical judgment, with good organization, scattering the great truth and the facts before the people, a majority of these States will within a twelvemonth send here Senators and Representatives that think as we think, and speak as we speak, and vote as we vote, and will give their electoral votes for whoever we nominate as candidate for President in 1868. These rebel States are ours if we will accept them. Do Senators desire to repel them? Does any Senator desire to keep these States out till after the next election? Surely no Senator can wish to go before the people in 1868 with these States out of their practical relations if we can restore them.

Who expects to see a rebel Senator or Representative from the State of South Carolina come to these Chambers? Do you distrust these black men who were true to us all through the war? They are as sure to vote for the cause of liberty, justice, and their country as they were to fight for their country in the war. Yet we are higgling about giving them the opportunity to vote after we have decided that they shall possess the right to vote. This proposition tends to prevent their having a chance to exercise the right to vote. We propose to ask their old rebel masters if they will consent that they shall have a chance to vote. That is the meaning of all this amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to call his attention to the clause in the law which we have passed on the subject of suffrage as it exists now, and will exist hereafter in the rebel States, although we may not pass this bill at all. It says:

"In all elections to any office under such provisional governments, all persons shall be entitled to vote, and none other, who are entitled to vote under the provisions of the fifth section of this act."

Where is the danger, then?

Mr. WILSON. It is practically this: we have given them the privilege of voting, but we want to give them a chance to do it, and the Senator does not want to have that chance given unless the rebel Legislatures consent to it. That is the truth of it, and you cannot argue around it or get over it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They have all the machinery in their own hands.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, they have the machinery; they have the State organizations, and can, if they choose, so legislate that you cannot have an election. We have clothed them with the power; now let us give them an opportunity to vote. We can carry ninety-nine out of every one hundred of these colored voters for their country, for liberty, for equal and just laws. They will vote for loyal men, and not only loyal men, but men who love liberty and justice and humanity. They will fill these Chambers with such men, instead of with the rebel leaders whom we have disqualified and disfranchised. A rebel cannot come to these Chambers; he cannot take the test oath; and nobody now proposes to change that oath. We have disfranchised the rebel leaders, who are excluded from office by the constitutional amendment, so they are almost powerless. Do Senators fear these disqualified and disfranchised leaders? What is there to do? Just let us have these men registered, and give them an opportunity to vote. Let them elect a convention, and if they elect conventions that will make constitutions complying with the terms and conditions we have proposed, and if they send here loyal representatives who can take the oath, we can admit them. The power is all in our own hands.

The terms we have made are hard enough, and I have no heart to ask anything more. The time has come, in my judgment, when, having laid down our conditions, having stamped our ideas and our principles on every foot of the rebel States, where they will remain while the continent lasts, for our friends there, those who have been true to the country's flag, those who have been emancipated, and those who want to do right, to have the opportunity to bring the States back to the Union. I do not believe there is any State in the South, unless it be the old State of Virginia and the State of Texas, that can maintain for three years an opposition to our ideas which the nation has imposed upon them, or can maintain a political antagonism to us. South Carolina and Mississippi and Louisiana and North Carolina are sure to vote as we vote during the years to come, unless we drive them from us. We have the power there; let us use it wisely. I know the men whom we have clothed with the suffrage there will vote for their own liberty, for their own rights, for the rights of their wives and children, for education, and for elevation.

We have heard of radical Radicals and of conservative Radicals. We know that the radicals of Radicals in this country are in the State of Missouri, lately a slave State. So it is in Tennessee, and so it will be in South Carolina within the next two or three years, and it must be so from the very nature of the contest. We must have in all these States a contest of principle. Our friends in Missouri have had this contest of principle. In our part of the country we are locally divided about little questions and measures, or about who shall be in power or who out; the great and fundamental principles of human rights are settled with us and have been settled for generations. There is no great contest about fundamental ideas or principles with us. In these States, however, there must be great contests of ideas and principles, and we shall find that there will be a liberal progressive party, a party of freedom, a party of enfranchisement, a party of liberal ideas, a party of popular education, a party that will go for elevating and improving the condition of the mass of the people, and that party must be in hostility to the old ideas and principles which pervaded that section of country. The result will be that in all these States we shall have a radical progressive party and a conservative party, and the radical men there will stand by the radical men of the country who have overthrown the slave power, overthrown slavery, saved their country, made the Republic forever free, passed the constitutional amendments, passed the civil rights bill, passed the enfranchisement acts, and made all men free and equal citizens. I think the time has come when we should give them the opportunity to act, and go to work and organize them so as to carry our ideas and our principles, which we believe will be for the good of the whole country. To do it we must begin the work; let into political action three million three hundred thousand blacks; put them in as an element of power. But while we do all this we should act generous toward all the men who have been in the rebellion, and take them by the right hand when they are ready to come with us and stand for the old flag, for the country, and for the ideas represented by the old flag in the struggles of the last six years.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate. Had I been here while the bill to which this is supplementary was pending, I should have taken occasion then to say what, though it be a little out of order, I desire to say now. First, however, I am a little surprised at the position of my conservative radical friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] Yesterday there was a proposition before the Senate to allow these people, in whom he has so much confidence, to say upon their ballot whether they desired a convention or not; but to that proposition the Senator, at the risk, as he said, of being called a conservative Radical, was opposed. I think he erred in judgment there. I think the Senate, before they get through with the discussion of this bill, will have to return to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] before it will be satisfactory to the majority of this body. I prefer, however, if that cannot be carried, that the amendment of the Senator from Maine shall prevail.

In the first place, my conservative friend from Massachusetts entertains a wish in which I do not in the fullest measure sympathize. I am in no hurry to have these rebels come back; but when I say that, I do not intend to throw any impediment in the way of their coming just so soon as it is safe for the loyal men of this country to have that element so largely mingled with them. The course of legislation of this body seems to be to accommodate itself in all respects to the necessities of rebels. I take another view of the necessities of the hour. I am not unmindful of the terrible struggle through which we have just passed; neither am I unmindful of the importance of the settlement of this question; but, sir, the highest consideration that should move this body in legislating upon the means of reconstruction is what is required by safety to the institutions we so much love and for which we have given so much blood and treasure. The loyal necessities of this country are to be taken into consideration. I do not believe that you can ever make a rebel loyal. A conquered rebel is always rebellious.

I have a little regard, too, for the class of people that the Senator from Massachusetts so warmly embraces; but there is a law just as inflexible in the mental as in the physical world, that the stronger will govern and control the weaker to a great extent. I do not expect of the lately enfranchised people that they, with the swaddling-clothes of freedom yet around them, can battle with these giants of Gath against whom they are to come face to face, either with arguments or mental powers. It took almighty power in olden time to rear a ministry for immediate use—a power higher, greater than the power of this Senate to confer upon these recently enfranchised people. I expect nothing else but that for many years their old masters will to a great extent control the vote of their former slaves and servants. We need not expect too much from those newly-enfranchised people or a superiority over the white race. Go through the New England States, into their vast manufacturing establishments, and when the hordes that flock out from there go to the polls to vote they vote more or less as representing the wishes of their employer, although their employer may not say one word to them about it. Go among these people and you will find the same fact existing, that unconsciously they are more or less swayed by the will of their former master. They are taking, if I may use the expression, the unsteady tread of the infant; they are now walking with blind eyes to some extent, and my distinguished friend from Massachusetts will find that he is mistaken when he arrays his power against that of their former advisers and masters. Sir, it is going to take a long time to build this race up into the full stature of the manhood of freedom.

The Senator asks why I keep them out. I read in a paper yesterday, and in a paper from the State which the gentleman has such great confidence in carrying, as a reason why they should embrace early this opportunity to return, that the master had not yet lost his control over his former slave, and they had better take this offer before he did so as to carry his vote. There is sound reasoning in that; there is sound philosophy in that reasoning.

I think the proposition of the Senator from Maine is better than nothing. Why? Because I entertain no doubt that it will retard their coming back. I do not want them to come back as the avalanche. I want these rebels to want to come back before I want them to come back. I have no right to take a rebel volens and drag him in here; I would rather give him a propelling power the other way, much rather. [Laughter.] My friend WILSON wants him brought here—I beg pardon, the Senator from Massachusetts—he is willing to have them come back if they come sandwiched between two black men. [Laughter.] Well, sir, if the sandwich and the covering are the same sort, I do not want either. I think there is great good sense in letting these rebels discuss this question among themselves. We have fed these men, taken them in their weakness and fed them from the bounty of this Government. On their increasing strength their rebel feelings outcrop and manifest themselves. I tell you and this Senate that those who are so anxious to bring these rebels into accord with loyalty in my judgment mistake the best interests of this country.

How often do we hear it said that had they the power they would repeat what they have already done; and who doubts it? Sir, when I voted for the appropriation to feed them the other day, I said I would feed them to show them that here was their only place of refuge and of safety. I want them to feel before they come here or are felt in this Legislative Hall or anywhere else, that they come because they have fed on husks long enough and find that there is no nutriment in them. I want them to return here because they love the institutions to which they return; and until that time comes every one of them that you marshal into your political forces is an element of political destruction.

Senators who oppose this amendment seem to solace themselves with the fact that these elections and this machinery are to be in the hands of the military commander. Mr. President, my regard for military power has increased since it put down rebellion. I have no apprehension of any abuse in the excessive exercise of power by the military; but the military that goes there, the officer that goes to control it goes by the will, the mandate of the Executive of this nation, who hates every lineament of this law; he has written upon it his condemnation; he has declared it unconstitutional, and its authors fools and crazy men. He it is that gives this military direction. Who do you think will go; and whoever does go how long will he stay if he carries into vigorous force the power of this law? No quicker, I venture to say, than an order for his displacement can be written and telegraphed.

Now, I wish to suggest another reason why I am for this amendment, if we cannot get the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. A few days ago, since the passage of this law, they held an election in an adjoining city, where the people utterly repudiated its power and defied its mandate. Upon that very election a case is being made up to-day to be presented to the Supreme Court of the United States to test the constitutionality of this whole law. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts where his reasoning would stand, and I ask my colleague from Nevada where his reasoning would stand, if the Supreme Court should declare the law unconstitutional? Who else but rebels could speak then in this reconstruction system?

Mr. STEWART. I will answer my colleague. If that is done, if it is not carried out, Congress will never let any of them in. We are under no pledges to do it in such an event.

Mr. NYE. I have been lulled by that siren song long enough. I do not know what Congress will do in this day of extreme cleverness and anxiety for new embraces. [Laughter.] I venture to make the suggestion to Senators upon this floor that that law has got to stand and to stand quickly before a tribunal that does not sympathize with Congress—I speak of its majority—in the measures of this great reconstruction.

I take for granted that in the zeal to pass a law for reconstruction all these reasons will not be overlooked; all these difficulties must be looked in the face; all of the exigencies that may by any possibility arise should be canvassed well before we cast our votes for immediate reconstruction.

Sir, I boast of being one of the humblest followers of radicalism. If by radicalism is meant to guard carefully the weak places of this Government against the approaches of rebel power, I am just as much of a Radical as I know how to be; and I do not know what a conservative Radical means. Now, sir, unfortunately for us, every great test measure is met either by the objection of the President or the Supreme Court. We are sandwiched literally between an unfriendly Executive and a hostile Supreme Court. Therefore I think we had better throw what safeguards we can around this, and I see, for myself, great wisdom in letting these rebels themselves discuss it. I would not keep the newly-enfranchised citizens from tasting the sweets of the power of this Government by any means, but I would guard them against being cheated and deceived in it. In this hurry, in this avalanche of coming States, I tell you, in my judgment, lies the greatest danger of the hour. If we are to take poison, let us take it in small doses, a little at a time; do not give us a fatal dose at once. These eleven rebellious States, coming as the wind comes, into these Halls of Congress, will shake the foundation upon which the Senate stands, even in Massachusetts. I regretted to hear the Senator say they had no issue in Massachusetts except as to who should hold place and who should not. Massachusetts is just as much interested in this great question as is South Carolina.

Mr. WILSON. Of course.

Mr. NYE. The Senator says of course, but he did not say so in his speech.

Mr. WILSON. I said we had only local struggles.

Mr. NYE. There is no local struggle in Massachusetts; there is not opposition enough to count as "scattering;" it is all one way; but there are States where this local opposition is frightfully strong, and if you mingle this element with the danger of the South coming here rebel end first, as I say with the rebel element of the North, and you are going to get more than a local question here in these Halls. My distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. Dixon] expects within two weeks that Connecticut will go Democratic, and when she does she is just as much to be feared as South Carolina, because she is not in accord with the vast swelling tide of public opinion of this nation. I do not say it will so go; but he hopes for it. They hoped for it in New Hampshire, but they failed. The strange thing is that while I know my friend from Connecticut is not a rebel, he laughs at the same thing they do—Democratic triumphs. Sir, the danger of the hour is in the haste of this legislation. I simply rose for the purpose of entering my protest against this compulsory process of bringing this dangerous element back.

Mr. WILSON rose.

Mr. NYE. I am not through yet. It always takes some nerve to defend a new position, and therefore I excuse my friend from Massachusetts for his nervousness. [Laughter.]

I rose to say that the original bill is not strong enough; I would have put more power into that bill if I had had the ability to do it, for it is written in all the past, it will be written in all the future, that nothing but power will control rebels and rebellion, and I am not so gingerly tender-footed on this question as not to be willing to declare the truth. I desire, in behalf of the institutions of the country I love, the only inheritance I possess, and the only inheritance that I expect to transmit to my posterity, to enter here my protest against hurrying this rebel element back to power.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have very great respect for the judgment of the distinguished Senator from Maine who offers this amendment, but I cannot vote for it. The effect of this amendment, as I understand it, is to enable the existing State governments in the rebel States to determine whether or not there shall be a convention, and whether or not there shall be reconstruction. We have declared those State governments to be provisional, but this amendment will enable them to perpetuate themselves and ordain themselves as continuing and permanent governments. These existing governments in the South were elected by about half the people; they are composed almost exclusively of rebels; and now we are proposing to put into the hands of these State governments the determination of the question whether there shall be reconstruction or not.

I should like to inquire of grave Senators how we can go before the country and justify ourselves in finally submitting this question to these existing State governments. I ask, sir, if we have not, as a party, for two years past denounced them as illegal and unauthorized, and I ask have we not denounced them as being put by the President into the hands of rebels for rebel purposes, giving to the rebels of the South the exclusive machinery of domestic State governments? I ask if the present President has not even been threatened with impeachment for the erection of these governments? And yet now it is deliberately proposed to put into their hands the determination of the whole question of reconstruction, to say whether it shall take place or not. Sir, can we go before the country and justify ourselves in doing this thing?

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. Nye] talks about the danger of the hour. I will tell him where I think the danger of the hour lies. It is in even permitting the impression to go abroad that the great Union party is opposed to reconstruction, and for political purposes is holding it back. Whenever that impression shall fasten itself upon the minds of the people of this country we shall go into a minority. The success of the Union party, in my opinion depends upon speedy and successful reconstruction; and if we are able to go into the canvass of 1868 and have inscribed upon our banner "the rebellion suppressed, the Union restored, equal rights and liberty secured to all," there can be no successful opposition made to us, but we shall sweep every northern State, and perhaps some southern States, according to the prediction of the Senator from Massachusetts. But if by our speeches or our votes, here or elsewhere, we shall allow the impression to prevail that we are casting obstacles in the way of reconstruction, that we are making legal provisions which may be taken advantage of by southern rebels to hold reconstruction back, we shall receive the condemnation of the people. Sir, the danger to the Republican party consists in the lingering of this work, in its procrastination, in its being long drawn out. If we shall go into the canvass of 1868 with the southern States in a worse condition than they were at the end of the war, and no real progress made in the work of reconstruction, we may expect to meet very serious opposition; but if we shall go into that canvass with the work accomplished, with the Union restored, with liberty and equal rights secured to all, we shall have accomplished the greatest work that any political party ever accomplished, and we shall be everywhere triumphant.

Upon every ground of policy, upon every ground of consistency, we dare not now place the whole question back in the hands of these rebel State governments which we have so bitterly denounced ever since they were erected by the President. We can justify ourselves in that course upon no reason that has been offered here this day. I say let the work of reconstruction go on. So far from putting it into the power of these rebel State governments to stay the work, I am opposed even to submitting the question of convention or no convention to the people as proposed by the Senator from Missouri, and I am opposed to submitting that question to the convention when it meets. Let the convention be elected; let it form a constitution; let that constitution be discussed and submitted to the people. All then have the right to vote upon the constitution. They will by that election have had time for deliberation; they will have had the benefit of discussion; and I believe that any fair constitution which shall have been made in any one of these States will then be adopted. But it is now proposed to submit the work of reconstruction to Legislatures elected last year or the year before, elected by half the people, and that half almost exclusively rebel. We submit the question to governments we have denounced as illegal, unauthorized, in violation of constitutional authority. Sir, we dare not do this thing.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] near the close of his speech was pleased to say that I had assumed a new position and was nervously anxious for its vindication. I have assumed no new position. I have no occasion to assume new positions on questions growing out of slavery or this rebellion. For more than thirty years, in private life and in public life before the people, in nine years of public service in the Legislature of my own State and in fourteen sessions of the Senate of the United States I have fought and spoken and voted for country and liberty, against slavery, secession, and rebellion. In May, 1836, nearly thirty-one years ago, I committed myself fully and unreservedly to the anti-slavery cause in the hour of its peril and weakness, and from that time to the present in all the conflicts of opinion and in all the struggles that have shaken the continent I have uttered no word and given no vote that did not tend practically to advance the anti-slavery cause, and taken no position that has not been sustained by an overwhelming majority of the anti-slavery men in America. But in all these conflicts of opinion, in the conflict of arms, I have cherished no hatred toward any portion of my struggling countrymen of the North or of the South.

I have entertained no doubts of the results of the conflict either of ideas or of arms; and if I cherished no spirit of wrath or of hatred when struggling in a minority or battling for the overthrow of the great rebellion in arms, I surely cannot do so now when the ideas for which we have struggled are triumphant and the slave-master's power broken forever. Patriotism and liberty, justice and humanity, alike demand that we should embrace in our affections the whole country and the people of the whole country; that we should bury, deeper than plummet ever sounded, all the bitter memories of the conflicts, and strive to cultivate mutual faith and common trust. Having saved our country, having emancipated a race, having made them citizens of the United States, having clothed them with the civil rights that belong to citizens of the United States, having armed them with the ballot for the protection of life, liberty, and property, having imposed upon their old masters conditions of the complete recognition of their equal rights before and under the laws of the country, let us grace our great triumphs, which earth applauds and Heaven blesses, by words and deeds of Christian charity. This is no new position for me to take; I hope it is no new position for the Senator from Nevada to take.

The Senator from Nevada tells us that we seem to be influenced in our action by the necessities of the rebels. When and how have we been influenced by the necessities of the rebels? We put down their rebellion with the hand of war after more than six hundred bloody contests. We have moved steadily onward by legislation and constitutional amendments until we have crowned all by requiring as an unalterable condition that the rebels shall accept our ideas, principles, and measures, and complete the work of our hands. In this action have we been influenced by the necessities of the rebels?

The Senator from Nevada tells us that the rebel Legislatures are urged to early and prompt action ere the influence of the slave-masters shall be lost over the freedmen. So the Senator from Nevada is willing to vote for the pending amendment that puts reconstruction and restoration in the keeping of rebel Legislatures. I do not want rebel Legislatures to seize the opportunity to use the commanding power of their organizations to obtain the controlling influence in their constitutional conventions. I would not permit rebel Legislatures which are organized to take a snap judgment, nor do I want them to delay the meeting of conventions. I would take the power out of the hands of these rebel Legislatures and place it in the hands of our district commanders. I would have the registration of the votes begin at once, for that registration will be a great preparation of the masses of the people anused to the exercise of political power.

The Senator tells us that the men we have emancipated and armed with the ballot are not prepared to exercise the right of suffrage intelligently, and it will take a long time to prepare them to do so.

Mr. NYE. I think I could not have said that. What I intended to say, and what I think I did say, was that it would take them a long time to grapple in the science of politics with those men who have spent a lifetime in it. I think so still.

Mr. WILSON. I agree with the Senator that it will take a long time for these emancipated men to learn to be able to grapple in the science of politics with the men who have controlled and still control the policy of those States. But we have clothed these emancipated men with power, and I want them to begin at once to exercise that power. The honorable Senator did tell us that they would be influenced more or less in their political action by their old masters, as the laboring men of the North were influenced more or less in their action by their employers. So we were told that these men would fight for their old masters, but they were true to country and to liberty in spite of the commanding influences of their masters, and they will be true to country and to liberty in spite of the influences of wealth or power.

I have, Mr. President, believed that the President committed an unpardonable offense against his country when he restored the rebels to power after the annihilation of the rebel armies. I have believed that the offices held in rebel States by rebels should be vacated. When the military government bill was pending, I moved an amendment providing that the offices filled by rebels should be vacated. I do not want rebels in power there or here, and therefore I want the people, the enfranchised black men, the men who have ever been loyal and true, and the repentant rebels to put these rebels out of power there as well as here. This bill is a practical mode of carrying into effect the conditions we have imposed. Its passage will hasten the day when the rebel chiefs must pass from power in these rebel States.

But the honorable Senator tells us that a case growing out of the Alexandria election is to be made up and taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that the court may pronounce all our legislation unconstitutional. It will be time enough for us to defer to the opinions of that court when they are promulgated. That court, I apprehend will pronounce no opinions for months to come. Let us go right onward then, complete the work we have begun, secure the adoption of the constitutional amendment, the revision of these State constitutions, the equality and enfranchisement of the freedmen, and the restoration of these States to their practical relations. Whatever may be illegal in the processes of reconstruction, if we legalize the result, no judicial tribunal can baffle or defeat the will of the nation.

We now occupy a commanding position; we dictate terms and conditions; we can devise practical modes of action to bring about as speedily as possible the desire of the nation, the final restoration of the States lately in rebellion. That restoration upon the conditions we have imposed will crown the great work in which we have been engaged. Then we can say that we were true to the cause of periled liberty; that we saved the life of the nation menaced by a gigantic rebellion; that we gave freedom to more than four million men; made them citizens of the United States; clothed them with civil rights and political power, and made our country great and glorious and an example to the nations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have a word to say on this amendment. I take it for granted that the object of the reconstruction measure which the Senate adopted was the admission and not the exclusion of the rebel States. If the object was to keep the rebel States out of the Union, to keep that connection severed, all we had to do was to do nothing. It was entirely unnecessary that week after week and night after night we should have stayed here laboring to perfect a measure by which these States might be restored in their relations to the Federal Government. I take that, then, for granted, by reason of the action of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

What is the objection to the bill which this amendment proposes to remedy? It is said to be this: that it is not desirable that any State should be introduced into the Union, or its relations restored to the Union, against its will. In that sentiment I suppose every Senator here will concur. That is all the object which is sought by the amendment, and in that we all concur. Why, then, should we not adopt the amendment? Simply because you do not get at the will of the people by adopting the amendment, and because the bill unamended does make ample provision to ascertain the will of the people. How? The bill provides that all the people, all male citizens who are twenty-one years of age, without distinction of race or color, shall have the right to vote for delegates to a convention. What then? Of course unless representative government is a failure, of course unless our own Government is a farce, those representatives, those delegates will represent the will and the sentiment of the constituency that elects them; just as we do; and that convention, when it is assembled, are, by the provisions of this bill, to vote whether they will form a constitution, or whether they decline to restore their relations to this Government, and therefore will form no constitution. Does not that get at the will of the people? As I said before, it does unless representative government is a farce.

But more than that: it is the very plan adopted and pointed out in the Constitution of the United States by which the will of the people is ascertained on any amendment that we propose to the American people. It is by the election of delegates who meet in convention that the will of the people is ascertained; and so they determine whether they will adopt an amendment to the Constitution or not. Can it be said that it is not a fair way of ascertaining the will of the people?

But again, Mr. President, can it be pretended that the expression of the sentiment of this convention, elected by all the people for the very purpose of ascertaining whether they will have a constitution or not, is not an infinitely fairer way of ascertaining the will of the people than to leave it to the provisional Legislature elected before the question was up, rebel in their tendencies, not elected by the whole people? Is it not a fairer way than any future Legislature of that provisional government, even when all the people vote?

That is one way which the bill provides to ascertain the will of the people; but there is another way. After the constitution is framed it must be submitted to the people, and, as I understand the act, it must be ratified by a majority of the votes of all who are registered. The language is, "of all who are qualified." Who are qualified? Those who are registered; and the language is identical in its signification as if it had said a majority of the votes of all who are registered.

So, then, delegates fresh from the people determine whether they will form a constitution or not. Then the constitution is submitted to the people, and it cannot become the law of the State unless a majority of all who are registered are in favor of it. In other words, every person who is registered, and who fails to vote, is counted as voting against restoring the relations to the Federal Government.

The distinguished Senator from Michigan says that he wants to see these rebel governments knocking at our door; he wants to see them brought to the stool of repentance. I do not want to have anything to do with the rebel governments. I do not want them knocking at the door. I want a government republican in form, clad in loyalty, coming to our door; and I want to see this nation open wide the portals and admit them. I think that there is much more danger, if you adopt the amendment, that you will see the loyal men of the South on the stool of repentance, humbling themselves in dust and ashes to a rebel government, asking them what? Asking them if they will just consent that they may take advantage of that law passed by the Congress of the United States; for if the rebel government, the provisional government says no, they must forever remain in their present miserable condition. I think the bill makes ample provision. I think the amendment will not bear the light of scrutiny.

Mr. President, in this bill I believe we have the basis of complete restoration. I believe we have what the people of this country will decree shall be a finality—no confiscation, no additions. There it is; it is the faith of the Government, and the faith of a Government is its religion, pledged to them. Let them comply with the terms, and we will fulfill it on our part. The people of this country approve the measure; the dominant party of the country are rejoicing over it; the Democracy, many of them, approve of it; the loyal men of the South adopt it; those who have been in rebellion are ready to take advantage of it.

I congratulate the country that the distinguished Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] at a critical point in the history of this bill, rose to the height of his great duty and gave this measure the sanction of his vote; and it has commended it to a large portion of the population of this country, who have looked to him to get a direction to the view they shall take on many subjects of a political character. I regret that the President had not given it his signature. The benign results of the bill perhaps would have been more speedy, but they would not have been more certain.

Sir, this country is in no danger. This country is safe in the hands of the people who own it and who love it. I want to extend the franchise. I want it to be enjoyed by all these ten rebel States. The rush of this nation in its political career will cease when political freedom, when equality, when exact justice are secured to every man in this country, and we will never have peace until that day comes. When the waters all rise to a common level then the current and the torrent will cease.

Mr. President, what have we done? We have put down a rebellion which the world said was invincible. We have verified the declaration of the Constitution, that the Constitution and the laws are the supreme law of the land, not of the loyal States, but of the land, and every rood and acre in this broad continent bounded by its tide of waters. Sir, if the inhabitants of these ten States should evacuate those States, the Constitution and the laws would brood and hover there, and the first mortal that stepped upon that soil would come under the dominion and the ægis of those laws. We have verified the declaration of the Constitution, that war and peace and currency and controversies between the States are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government. And we have verified another declaration of the Constitution: that the Federal Government has the right to pass all laws to carry these powers into execution; and those three propositions contained in the Constitution answer the whole veto message of the President.

Now, sir, the war being ended, the Constitution being vindicated, let us have harmony and peace, not by the sacrifice of any principle, but by obtaining all that Radicals or radical Radicals ever asked. Here is a measure that was passed a fortnight since by three fourths of the Congress of the United States. Is it necessary now that we should say that all this action shall be nugatory and void, except the single act of registration, unless the provisional governments of these States consent that the people may take advantage of the legislation which we have enacted in their favor? I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the whole range which this discussion has taken this morning upon the proposition of the honorable Senator from Maine has only confirmed me in the estimate which I placed upon the necessity and importance of the amendment that I submitted yesterday, to have the people in the rebel States themselves directly express their wishes in regard to the formation of a government under this act. It seems to be conceded on all hands, not only in the act reported by the committee, but in all the remarks of Senators on the floor since that report was presented and placed before the Senate, that in some way or other there should be on the part of that southern people an expression of their wish on the subject of the formation of a government loyal to the Union. The bill provides for that expression after a convention shall have been held and when the constitution formed by that convention shall be voted upon by the people. I thought that was taking the expression of opinion at the wrong end of the line, taking it at the end instead of the beginning.

Now, the Senator from Maine seems to think that there is still another way in which this expression shall be made; and he proposes that it shall be made in advance by the action of the provisional Legislatures now in office there. Upon this there is one single view which I have to bring to the attention of the honorable Senator from Maine, which has not been adverted to by any gentleman who has yet addressed the Senate, and which, in my judgment, is conclusive against his proposed amendment. Reference has been made by Senators here to the fact that these very Legislatures who have to initiate the movement under this amendment of the honorable Senator's to form a State government there were elected in times passed; but there is one thing in connection with that fact which has not yet been mentioned before the Senate by any gentleman, I believe, who has yet addressed it; and that is, that you have the question determined by the amendment of the Senator from Maine for the present people of the rebel States by a Legislature in each State which represents another, a different, and a past constituency. If these Legislatures were elected last year, they do not represent the constituency of the present year. If they were elected by the people in 1865, they still less represent the people of those States in 1867. It is, therefore, very plain to my mind that it would be a gross act of injustice to the people of those States in 1867 to allow a Legislature elected in 1866 or 1865, and representing an entirely different constituency, to speak for them upon this most important subject.

I am, therefore, constrained, Mr. President, to vote against the proposition of the honorable Senator from Maine; and I do trust, as it seems to be the common mind of the Senate, not only as shadowed forth in the bill, but as expressed in the remarks of Senators, that by the time this bill comes back into the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, it may be that, with that high frankness which should characterize this body on a reconsideration of all the arguments made use of here, some of the gentlemen who yesterday voted against the proposition which I made, to submit the whole question of a State government to the people directly in the beginning, will see finally that that is the true key-note of this whole transaction. My idea is that no State government shall by any possible device or machinery be forced upon those people. All the agency which Congress should have in this matter is to open the door for reconstruction, and leave it to that people to come in or to stay out, as they please. Therefore I am opposed to first forcing them into an election of delegates, when they might not wish those delegates to act. I am opposed to any proceeding which looks like demanding of them to come in. I wish them to exercise their own unbiased will. If they desire to come back with a constitution and government loyal to the Union, let them come. If they wish to stay out because they do not desire to form such a constitution and State government as that, I say to them stay out for a hundred years to come. I do not want to force them.

Therefore it was that yesterday I thought I would invoke before this Senate and before the country the very fundamental idea of all our institutions, the consent of the people to their own government, and have that consent registered, recorded in the ballot-box of the country and in the archives of the country before they should take one step in it. Then, sir, we should stand in an impregnable position, to wit, that we have fairly and bona fide submitted to that people the question whether they will form such a government, and their recorded decision is either in favor of or against it, and the whole responsibility rests with them. Then, when that is done, the vocation of the Supreme Court to nullify the acts of a loyal Congress is gone. I hope, I yet hope, from what I have heard on the floor of the Senate this morning, and from my profound conviction that no pride of opinion will lead any Senator ever to adhere to a vote that he has given a moment longer than it seems to him wise to do so, that when the question comes up again upon this matter of starting at the foundation, building the foundation upon the voice of the people, and putting the superstructure up with that voice, and putting the very cap-sheet to the structure with that same voice, having that same people to bring it all here to us and say at last, "Sirs, here is what not a minority have done, not what a few oligarchs have done, but what the people have done; the people laid the corner-stone; the people built the superstructure; the people hand it over to you complete—it is my hope, sir, that at last a returning sense of wisdom in the Senate will induce them to make a provision which shall bring about that result, which, when brought about, ties those States to the Union with bonds which shall never be broken, and the fairness of the imposition of which they themselves can never question."

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe the Senate has ordered a fight session upon this bill, and as it is nearly four o'clock I will move that the Senate resolve itself into executive session.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. ANTHONY. Let us take a vote on this amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall not go into executive session at this hour.

Mr. CONNESS. There will be no further discussion, I presume, on the pending amendment, and we can get a vote upon it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I withdraw the motion with pleasure. I have only to say that I shall vote for this amendment, and I should have cheerfully voted for the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Missouri if it had provided that a majority of the persons voting at the election proposed by him should have determined the question. The difficulty I had in my head in supporting his amendment was, that he proposed to count the persons who did not vote, and who, therefore, in my opinion, ought not to be included or considered in the determination of the question suggested by the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I desire to make one remark. I certainly shall not be long, and I may crave the indulgence of the Senate when I say it is the first time I have said anything since the debate began yesterday.

In voting on the proposition of the Senator from Maine I ask myself one question: how would the Union men of the South vote, if they had the privilege, on the proposition now before us? They are unrepresented. We here ought to be the representatives of the unrepresented. How, then, would the Union men of the South vote on the proposition of the Senator from Maine? I cannot doubt that with one voice they would vote no. They would say that they would not trust their fortunes in any way to the existing governments of the rebel States. Those governments have been set up in spite of the Union men; and during their short-lived existence they have trampled upon Union men and upon their rights. That region might be described almost as bleeding at every pore, and much through the influence of the existing governments. They owed their origin to the action of the President. So long as they continue their influence must be pernicious. I hear, then, the voice of every Union man from every one of the rebel States coming up to this Chamber and entreating us to refuse all trust, all power to these existing Legislatures. I listen to their voice, and I shall vote accordingly.

But I feel, nevertheless, that something ought to be done in the direction of the proposition of the Senator from Maine. I listened to his remarks, and in their spirit I entirely concur; but it seems to me that his argument carried us naturally to the proposition of the Senator from Missouri. That is a proposition to my mind founded in good sense, in prudence, in a just economy of political forces. It seems to me the Senator from Missouri begins at the right end. He begins with the people, and he proposes that the new governments, when constituted, shall stand on that broad base. The other proposition, the proposition of the committee, to my mind has too much the air of standing the pyramid on its apex. I am therefore for the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, and I hope that at the proper time he will renew it again and give us another opportunity of recording our votes in its favor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on that as a test question. If it is voted down, I shall withdraw the other amendments.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (when his name was called,) said: On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.]

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Thayer, and Williams—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—83.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Riddle, and Saulsbury—6.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask leave now to withdraw the other amendments that I submitted, as I considered this a test question.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is the first amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is the first, and it is a test question I suppose. There were two others that followed it and were part of the same proposition, which I now ask leave to withdraw.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and they are withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 10) in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 49) to repeal a joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland," approved January 29, 1867; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate resolve itself into executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is done I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall resist going into executive session, and I hope that the friends of this measure, if it has any, will sustain me in doing so. It is manifest that there is a disposition in some quarters to prolong action on the measure. If we can only vote on one amendment a day, with the amendments that are likely to be proposed, we may be here indefinitely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, and I hope the Senator will allow that to be done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is there any such importance in that as to interrupt the business before the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it referred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that, but I object to going into executive session.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 38) to relieve Robert M. Patton and Joseph E. Brown from disability to hold office; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 31st of January, correspondence between the Department of State and the United States consul at Geneva with reference to the policy of the President toward the States lately in rebellion; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 10) in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to the interruption of the business before the Senate unless the Senate determines by a vote to go into executive session, and on that I shall ask for the yeas and nays. I express the hope that the friends of the passage of this bill will adhere to it and pass it. We see the effect of adjourning. We have had the debate of yesterday all over to-day, and you will have it all over to-morrow—

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to inquire if a recess has been ordered this evening?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then we may as well spend an hour now in disposing of the executive communications and come back here in the evening and go on with the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Ohio is in favor, when we have had a discussion here and got it to a close and are prepared for action, of going into executive session each day, and the majority of the Senate so decide, I cannot help it; but I do think that if you mean to get through with this bill within any reasonable time, you must adhere to it, and if there is a majority of the Senate in favor of it I hope it will do so. If it is not, let us give way to these side motions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of this bill and expect to vote for it, and am willing to sit it out, if the Senator desires, to-night; but certainly every day we ought to have an executive session. This is the usual hour and a proper time. We can spend an hour in executive session, and then come back this evening and perhaps dispose of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say to my friend from Illinois that I protest against his putting or attempting to put anybody here in the predicament he seems to desire. Now, I am in favor of this bill generally, but I want it amended. I have tried my own amendment, and that has failed. I am content when I am whipped to recognize the fact; but I do not wish it to be said, "If you vote to go into executive session, necessary as you may deem it, you are therefore against this bill." I do not admit that fact. I am in favor of passing the bill after it has been discussed and properly amended, if it needs amendment, and of taking such time for it as may be necessary. We are not particularly pressed in that regard; but I do think we ought every day, as we are having so many executive communications, and especially when we have agreed to take a recess and meet this evening, to have those communications referred to the proper committees. I am therefore in favor of the motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It must be apparent to every Senator, and to none more than the Senator from Maine, that after the passage of this bill, if it should pass, the Senate will necessarily be detained here a very considerable time. I am not aware of any other measure, except this, that is likely to keep the Senate here. This measure, if it passes, has to go to the House, has to be considered there; and no one knows better than the Senator from Maine that in a single day, with no other business before us, we could dispose of all the executive business twice over. I do not say that the Senator from Maine is opposed to this measure; I suppose he is for some measure of this kind; and I did not mean to be understood as saying that every person who should vote to go into executive session was opposed to this bill. What I meant to say was this: that from my experience in the Senate, if we adjourned each day at the close of a lengthy discussion, without proceeding any further than a vote upon a single amendment, when the discussion of the day is pretty much exhausted, we are likely to have it all over again at our next meeting, and we shall make very little progress. We tried this yesterday. We had the yeas and nays on going into executive session. We lost a great deal of time on the persistent motion to go into executive session. It was carried, and is very likely to be carried to-day. I can only do my duty, as I conceive it to be, having charge of this measure as chairman of the committee who reported it, and ask the Senate to continue this bill before the Senate, certainly until a later hour than this. It will take but a few minutes to read the executive communications; certainly it would not take an hour, a quarter or a third of our whole session. But if the Senate votes the other way I shall submit to it as willingly as the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not wish to take up any time in discussing the order of business; but I wish to say, as stated by the honorable Senator from Maine, that I am a friend of this bill, but also I think we should keep along with the executive business, and I shall vote now to go into executive session, and then vote with the Senator to stay here as long as he shall want us to do so this evening.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the honorable chairman of the committee will withdraw his opposition to this motion. There will be no difficulty in passing the bill either to-night or to-morrow. The House has adjourned over until Monday, as I understand, and there is executive business on the table which I understand requires immediate attention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that I desire to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Fessenden, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Williams, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Yates—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cragin, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Morton, Riddle, and Saulsbury—8.

So the motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened; and, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate adjourned, with the understanding that the vote should be taken at four o'clock tomorrow on House bill No. 33.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BARCLAY'S DIGEST.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on the Rules, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the present House the usual edition of Barclay's Digest, together with the Constitution, Rules, and Manual; and that John M. Barclay be allowed one dollar per copy for the copyright of the same.

PRINTING OF LAWS.

Mr. BANKS. I am also instructed by the same committee to report the following additional rule:

RULE—When an act has been approved by the President, the usual number of copies shall be printed for the use of the House.

The usual number of copies will be fifteen hundred and fifty, the same number as are now published of the other documents provided for the use of members. The effect of this rule if adopted will be to have each act when approved by the President immediately printed for the use of members of the House. We now have no opportunity of getting at a law which has been passed, except by reference to newspapers in which it may be published or by application to the Clerk's office. I hope the rule will be adopted.

The question was taken on agreeing to the proposed rule, and it was agreed to.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF MESSAGES.

Mr. BANKS. I am also instructed by the same committee to report the following as an additional rule:

RULE—Messages from the Senate and President of the United States, giving notice of bills passed or approved, shall be repeated from the Clerk's desk forthwith.

As messages are now delivered from the Senate, and also by the Secretary of the President, it is impossible for any member of the House to know what bills have been acted upon or what the action may have been. If this proposed rule shall be adopted, a message from the Senate or from the President will be forthwith repeated from the Clerk's desk. It will probably lead to a change in the manner in which messages are delivered here; so that the message from the Senate, for instance, instead of reading the titles of bills at length which have been acted upon by the Senate, will submit the message in brief, and it will be read at length from the Clerk's desk.

I am informed by the Speaker that the messages from the President announcing his action upon bills are now sent to the Speaker in writing, and those messages can be announced from the Clerk's desk at such time as the Speaker may direct.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] if this new rule proposes that all messages shall be reported at length from the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BANKS. It is limited merely to the announcement of the bills which have been acted upon.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. And to bring the bills up for action?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; merely to announce that the Senate has acted upon such and such bills, or that the President has approved such and such bills.

Mr. PRUYN. I am very glad indeed the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has brought this subject to the attention of the House, for I think we have all felt the want of sufficient information in regard to what has occurred in the Senate from the manner in which messages from that body have been announced to this House. But I wish to suggest to the gentleman in reference to these messages that it would be an improvement upon his suggestion if the Speaker be requested to announce to the House the character of the message, or what may be the message from the Senate, in analogy to the proceedings in other legislative bodies in which I have always found that rule to prevail.

With regard to the messages from the President of the United States, if they come here in writing, as I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to say they do, it would be proper of course that the Clerk should read them under the direction of the Speaker; but I think in regard to the messages from the Senate it would be more proper, it would show more respect to the Senate, and come with more effect before the House, if we should request our Presiding Officer to announce what those messages may be.

Mr. BANKS. The object desired by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] can be obtained by the rule reported by the committee. I do not think it would be an improvement to have the messages announced by the Speaker. And I am quite sure it would impose a labor upon the Speaker which the House would not desire to put upon him. The announcement of the messages from the Clerk's desk by the reading Clerk would come from the officer of the House appointed for that purpose. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the rule was adopted.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate joint resolution No. 1, presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody; when the Speaker signed the same.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a personal explanation. In the report of my remarks made in Committee of the Whole on the Senate joint resolution appropriating $1,000,000 for the starving poor of the South, I am reported as saying: "I cannot vote for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]" This might be construed to mean that I was unwilling to vote money for the support of the widows and orphans of those Union soldiers who died in southern prisons. Such are not my sentiments; for there is no one on the floor of this House who has a deeper sympathy for the class of persons above named. What I did say is this: "I cannot vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as a substitute, but I would, if necessary, vote for it as an amendment when it would be in order to move it as such."

I was unwilling to allow a substitute like the one offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to prevail, as it would deprive the starving orphans and women of the South of bread. I wish to place myself right on this question.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, presented the credentials of RUFUS MALLORY, member-elect from the State of Oregon.

Mr. MALLORY then presented himself and took the oath prescribed by law.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. BANKS. The Committee on the Rules have directed me to move the following amendment to the rules:

Amend Rule 134 by adding at the end thereof the following:

Provided, That ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and who shall so register themselves, may also be admitted within the Hall of the House. And no persons except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker, one of the objects of this amendment to the rules is to prevent the obstruction of our business by the crowds of visitors that find their way upon the floor of the House on all occasions of great interest, subjecting the members as well as the officers of the House to great inconvenience. Another object of this amendment is to admit to the privileges of the floor persons who have hitherto been members of the House. I think that every gentleman will concede that we should extend to ex-members the courtesy of admission to the floor of this House, as they are admitted in the Senate. There has been a difficulty heretofore, arising from the fact that some ex-members of Congress have been professionally engaged in prosecuting claims before Congress. By this proposition persons thus interested are to be excluded; and ex-members of Congress desiring entrance upon the floor will be required to register themselves, in such manner as the Speaker may direct, as not being interested in the prosecution of any claim before Congress.

Another provision of this amended rule is that no other persons than those specified in the rule shall, unless by general consent of the House, be admitted to the floor by any officer of the House. If this provision be adopted, our rule on this subject will correspond precisely, I believe, with the rule which has been adopted by the Senate, where it has operated exceedingly well. I hope this proposed amendment to our rules may be adopted. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to inquire whether there is to be any system of enforcing this rule. We have now a rule specifying certain classes of persons as entitled to the privileges of the floor and excluding all others. Yet during the last Congress, when it was my fortune to occupy a place in the outer circle of seats, I suffered daily, almost constantly, from the presence of persons who had no right to be upon the floor. They would occupy my seat and engage in conversation with members and other persons around me, so that during a large part of the time it was impossible for me to understand what was going on in the House.

Having had the good fortune at this session to get away from the outer circle of seats, I have for several days had upon my table a resolution which I intended to offer, providing for an enforcement of this rule with reference to admission to the floor of the House. I think there ought to be an understanding that the members of the Committee on the Rules or some other persons in the House should see to it that the Doorkeeper enforces the rule. And I believe I am prepared to give notice that if this rule be adopted, and if the Doorkeeper does not enforce it, I shall, acting in behalf of gentlemen who occupy the outer circle of seats, ask that the Doorkeeper be subjected to the censure of the House or removed from office.

Mr. BANKS. It is believed that this amendment to the rule, now reported from the committee, will accomplish the object desired by my colleague. It proposes to change the present rule by declaring that with the exception of those specified in the rule no person shall at any time during the sessions of the House be admitted upon the floor. The custom heretofore has been that, on the pressing application of members, gentlemen not privileged have been admitted by the consent of the Speaker or by leave of the Doorkeepers. If this amended rule should be adopted, the officers of the House will feel prohibited by the express terms of the rule from admitting to the floor of the House any person not entitled to admission by the rule or by the order of the House. Such will be the effect as understood and desired by the members of the committee.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this amendment to the rule does not contemplate that those admitted shall register their names in a book to be kept at the door.

Mr. BANKS. It does.

Mr. SPALDING. That will be a safeguard.

Mr. BANKS. It is declared in the proposition which we submit that every ex-member of the House shall before admission register himself.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to modify or enlarge this proposed new rule, so as to provide that any ex-member interested in any financial measure or appropriation of land shall also be excluded.

It seems to me that the rule is not sufficiently broad to embrace all who should be excluded from the floor. I do not see why ex-members of Congress who are interested in land grants or in appropriations or in measures of great importance to themselves should be admitted here when persons advocating claims are excluded. I suggest that the gentleman make his rule effective and just. It should include not only all persons having a personal interest in financial measures or measures granting lands or other measures of great importance, but persons interested in claims.

Mr. BANKS. It is not my province to make any modification of the resolution. I report it as unanimously agreed to by the committee.

Mr. CHANLER. Is an amendment in order? The SPEAKER. It is if the gentleman from Massachusetts yields for that purpose.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the previous question. The previous question was seconded—ayes sixty, noes not counted—and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the rule was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. As this rule has been amended, the Chair will state that by the usage in both branches of Congress during their entire history, as the Chair believes, all persons who have received a vote of thanks by Congress are allowed admission to the floor, not by any written, but by an unwritten rule. The Chair understands that that usage is not to be changed.

Mr. PRUYN. A single suggestion in regard to the admission to the floor of persons of distinction and of the class to which the Speaker has just referred. The gentleman from Massachusetts informs me that the custom has always been for the Speaker to take the responsibility in such cases, and I hope that will be the understanding now.

The SPEAKER. That has been the usage; but since the present occupant of the chair has held the position he has felt it his duty not to give that consent, but has referred the matter to the Doorkeeper. The Chair does not like to take the responsibility, and therefore declined two or three years ago, when requested, to make any formal order. These cases can be acted upon by the unanimous order of the House.

Mr. PRUYN. One word further. It appears to be necessary that our Presiding Officer should have authority to admit these persons.

The SPEAKER. The usage has been to admit such persons, but the present Speaker has not ordered the Doorkeeper to admit them, although the custom still exists, as he understands, of admitting them.

Mr. PRUYN. I suppose the House will consent to a modification of the rule to meet that necessity.

Mr. BANKS. The object desired by the gentleman from New York, of allowing the admission of distinguished persons, can be easily attained by the Speaker asking the general consent of the House for the admission of such persons at any time.

The SPEAKER. If it is the order of the House, the Chair will assume the responsibility; if not, he will throw the responsibility upon the House.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope the Chair will assume the responsibility.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope he will not.

Mr. SCHENCK. As formerly understood those who had received by name the thanks of Congress were included. I suggest the propriety of having them included now by unanimous consent.

Mr. BANKS. That is understood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York suggests the modification. The Chair hears no objection, and the rule is therefore so amended.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the various votes taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 2) to authorize the refunding of discriminating duties exacted upon merchandise imported in Hawaiian vessels; when the Speaker signed the same.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the papers in the case of James Hooper, of Baltimore, were withdrawn from the files of the House.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, the papers in the case of George A. Taylor and of Joseph Ballum were withdrawn from the files.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the papers in the case of J. Roward, presented January 24, 1849, were withdrawn from the files.

On motion of Mr. GRISWOLD, the papers in the case of Hiram Slocum were withdrawn from the files.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on the Rules, reported the following as an additional rule:

RULE— Estimates of appropriations and all other communications from the Executive Departments, intended for the consideration of any of the committees of the House, shall be addressed to the Speaker, and by him submitted to the House for reference.

Mr. BLAINE. If any explanation is needed, I will state that the object of this amendment to the rules is to put in the possession of the whole House information that has hitherto been confined to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask the previous question on the adoption of the new rule.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the rule was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that after the adoption of this rule he will notify the heads of the several Departments, so that their communications may be made in accordance with the rule adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BLAINE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Rules to offer also the following amendment to the rules.

Amend Rule 77 by inserting after the word "failure" in the twelfth line the following:

In all cases where appropriations cannot be made specific in amount, the maximum to be expended shall be stated, and each appropriation bill, when reported from the committee, shall in the concluding clause state the sum total of all the items contained in said bill.

I ask the previous question upon the adoption of the amendment to the rule.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the rules was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the several amendments to the rules reported by him were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAINE. I am further instructed by the Committee on the Rules to report adversely upon the resolution offered by the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] proposing an amendment to the rules.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of every committee to report to the House as early as practicable every bill and joint resolution referred to such committee, with the report or recommendation of the committee thereon; and no committee shall fail or neglect to make such report unless it shall be rendered impossible for want of time. But nothing herein shall change the existing rule regulating the order in which the committees are called for reports or enlarge the two morning hours allowed to committees to report.

The resolution was laid on the table.

CLAIMS AGAINST UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution relative to claims against the Government of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, for the remainder of this session.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

MARK HOWARD.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to adjust the accounts of Mark Howard; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. HULBURD. I rise to what I believe to be a question of privilege. I have a resolution which I think is privileged, and after it has been read a first and second time I shall consent that it shall go on the table, if it should not be the pleasure of the House to consider it now; but in connection with it I ask leave of the House to reply to the charges of a high Federal officer in the city of New York against the Committee on Public Expenditures of the last Congress. The Speaker will rule if it be a question of privilege after the resolution has been read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be requested to appoint the Committee on Public Expenditures, and that said committee, when appointed, shall take into consideration a report made at the last session by such committee on the subject of the New York custom-house, and report what action is advisable in the premises.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that a resolution directing the Speaker to appoint one of the standing committees of the House is a question of privilege, and the resolution is in order and before the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I shall object to the appointment of any more standing committees of this House unless all shall be appointed.

The SPEAKER. That will depend upon the action of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I know it will; but I shall object to it.

Mr. HULBURD. At the last session of Congress the Committee on Public Expenditures, of which I had the honor to be the chairman, were directed by a sub-committee, not exceeding three in number, to proceed to investigate alleged abuses and frauds in connection with the Boston and New York custom-houses. They proceeded to Boston, made their investigation, and submitted a report calling for no action. They then proceeded to examine the New York custom-house with no intent to do "nor set down aught in malice," applying themselves laboriously, patiently, earnestly, and unweariedly to the discharge of the duty devolved upon them. And on the very last days of the last session of the last Congress they submitted their report, but it was too late in the session to act or expect action. That report, and a portion of the evidence also, appeared in the New York papers on Monday of last week. The collector of the port of New York immediately issued a card charging that the report of the committee was "spiteful," and that its animus was prompted by his inability to grant them the appointments for which they had made application. Sir, that is a very grave charge to make against the committee; and graver still when there is not a shadow of foundation for it. That committee never asked an appointment of Mr. Smythe that he did not accord. On the contrary, he tendered to them appointments which they never asked for, and never would accept. I leave that part of the matter there.

I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read certain paragraphs from the Daily Globe of March 7, 1867, which I have marked:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, on Monday evening a newspaper was placed in my hand, in which I find a report of a committee of the last House of Representatives, submitted by Mr. HULBURD, of New York, which demands notice at my hands. It fills me with surprise and indignation. Without any notice to me, without calling upon me for any explanation, this report, by inference and not by direct charge, by innuendo, not by positive averment, endeavors to create the impression that I received or agreed to receive $5,000 or some other pecuniary or other benefit from Mr. Smythe, the collector of the port of New York.

"This charge, whether made directly or by implication, whether sought to be sustained by proof or innuendo, is absolutely and unqualifiedly false, and from whatever source it comes I pronounce it a base falsehood, a vile and cowardly slander."

"Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I see by the newspapers that I am involved in the same charge that is made against the Senator from Wisconsin, of having received $5,000 from Mr. Smythe. I will dispose of that in a very few words. There is no direct charge, but there is an innuendo that I was to receive $5,000 from the same person referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin. All I have to say that the document alluded to by him is false in its charges, false in its insinuations, and false in its innuendoes. I never received a copper from Mr. Smythe; and, if it were senatorial to say so, I would say that the insinuation is as false as hell."

Mr. HULBURD. It will be noticed that these gentlemen in their statements do not deny that there was an arrangement of the kind indicated. The report of the committee never charged that they received, either individually or collectively, a single dollar from Mr. Smythe, or through him in any way. The committee did feel that it was their duty to show the manner in which Mr. Smythe was conducting the office of collector of the port of New York. They did suppose that in order to show that manner, to show whether it was corrupt or not, it was within their province to prove the quo animo with which he was conducting it. And they had no other means of doing it except by proving his declarations and acts, and they deemed it proper to spread before the House and the country the testimony they thus obtained, and that is the head and front of their offending in this particular.

Mr. DOOLITTLE called upon me a day or two after the report of the committee was made public. He stated that he felt himself very much aggrieved, for the committee had charged him with receiving money from the collector of the port of New York. I disclaimed it. He said it would go abroad to the country and injure him. I told him I very much regretted any such result, for I had made no such charge in the report. He thought he ought to have been examined, and that his denial ought to have gone out with the report. Afterward, upon reflection, I wrote a note to Mr. DOOLITTLE, which I sent over to him by one of the pages of this House, in which I stated that I did not wish to do him injustice, and that if I had done so I regretted it; that I would give him an opportunity to make any explanation or denial that he might deem proper; that as the report was closed I would simply ask that it should be dated pro forma on the 2d of March, or, as the lawyers say, nunc pro tunc, now for then, and I would send it to the Public Printer as addenda to the testimony of the report. At that very time the committee had in their hands notes not written out of the testimony of our minister at Paris, Mr. Bigelow, to be sent to the Public Printer. I strained a point in speaking of these dates, as he seemed to have a great desire to append a denial to the report. I mention this merely to show that there was no unkindness on the part of the committee toward Senator DOOLITTLE or any intention to do him injustice.

Since that report was made and published in the papers, my attention has been called to various other portions of the testimony, some of which have been printed and some not. I deem it my duty to say to the House that the fact that Mr. Smythe did have it in contemplation to give these gentlemen $5,000 each does not depend upon the testimony of Mr. Smythe, or upon the testimony of any one man, or upon the testimony of any half dozen witnesses.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a portion of the testimony which was submitted to the committee, and which has been printed. I beg leave to read a sentence or two from the testimony of Mr. Phelps. He is speaking of an interview in the President's room, at which himself and Mrs. Perry, and perhaps Mr. Barr, were present:

"The President assured me that Phelps and Barr should have the general-order business, as above stated, they bringing proper testimonials. He remarked that he gave this to Barr and Phelps as much for the benefit of Mrs. Perry as for their benefit, because he wished to help her. He said, 'I suppose that you will make it all right with Mrs. Perry.'"

"Question. Was it not then determined what portion she was to have of this business?"

"Answer. She told Mr. Johnson the arrangement or interest she was to have, and Mr. Johnson then replied he was satisfied if she was."

"Question. What was the portion she was to have?"

"Answer. She was to have one third of the net profits."

"Question. Did you produce the testimonials required?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question. Tell the committee about the substance of that interview."

"Answer. I said to the President there would be a great deal of contention among the New York politicians, who would try to get this, as it was a great thing; he patted me on the shoulder and said: 'Never mind, young man, I will stand by you;' he then remarked to Mrs. Perry: 'This will be all right;' we left the matter in Mrs. Perry's hands, and she was to inform us when we should call again on the President; she sent word for me to come to Washington again shortly before Mr. Smythe was appointed, and we went and called upon the President, and had an interview with him alone, myself and Mrs. Perry; after we had a private interview with him he called out his Private Secretary, Colonel Browning, I think his name is, and he told me to state to him what I wanted to have written down; I stated to him what I wanted, and he then wrote to the collector to give the general order business of the North river, from pier No. 59 to the Battery, to Edward H. Phelps and Thomas J. Barr, of New York; the President was present while the Private Secretary wrote this letter, and was talking in a low tone to Mrs. Perry, and when the letter was written he signed it, I think I can produce that letter; I came back with the letter, and as soon as Mr. Smythe was nominated and confirmed I presented the letter to him; he appeared to be very much confused, and put his hand up to his head and thought for a moment, and then remarked that the general order business was all disposed of; he said, 'It is very strange that the President never told me to reserve this for his friends;' and he also remarked that he had to agree to give a portion of the general order business to Senator DOOLITTLE's son, and a portion to Senator PATTERSON, the President's son-in-law, and one other person who I cannot now think of, before he would be confirmed; Mr. Smythe then remarked, he didn't have a chance to spare only a small interest in it for himself, and he asked us if we would not take one fourth interest in the whole business—that perhaps he could let us have that."

The witness failed to produce that letter. It was left with the collector, and he had destroyed or mislaid it, or he could not find it. Mark the statement: he says he had agreed to this before he could or would be confirmed. That is not the statement of the committee; it is the statement of a witness before the committee. Mr. Smythe himself does not deny that he had this in contemplation. It is true that in a letter which purports to be signed by him, addressed to the President of the United States, of the date of March 6, 1867, he declares:

"This purpose, as I testified to the committee under oath and again repeat here, was unknown to most of those whom I intended to commit the business to; was a purpose never executed, a half-formed project, speedily dismissed from my mind."

"A half-formed project!" "Speedily dismissed!" He should instruct better, as to dates and facts, the counsel who prepare his cards and epistolary pronouncements. Why, sir, half a dozen witnesses swore before the committee that at different places and occasions and times, widely distant and separate, he had distinctly stated to them individually that he made an arrangement of this kind. In the month of May he commenced it; and I have in my hand the testimony of a witness who swears to having been told by Mr. Smythe as follows:

"Some time in October last, as near as I can remember, in a desultory conversation with Mr. Smythe, collector of the New York custom-house, he stated, to the best of my recollection, that he had agreed to give, or was going to give, out of the general-order business $5,000 to Robert Johnson, $5,000 to Mr. Patterson or Mrs. Patterson, $5,000 to a son of Senator DOOLITTLE, and retain in his own hands five or ten thousand dollars for political purposes."

Now, sir, how long it takes Mr. Smythe to incubate a project which he commenced upon in May and had not dismissed in October the House can judge as well as myself; whether the retention of it four or five months is in law or in fact a "speedy dismissal" anybody's good sense can determine. Mr. Smythe stated distinctly when before the committee that he had never had any conversation with Senator DOOLITTLE on the subject of the general-order business before he was nominated and confirmed; the postscript of his letter to the President states he had "never spoken to either Senator with regard to this matter," yet Mr. Spalding, of New York, a lawyer in good and regular standing, who was subpoenaed before the committee, testified that in conversation with Senator DOOLITTLE, the Senator told him that Mr. Smythe had conversed with him on the subject of the general-order business, and had agreed when the warm weather was over to have his son, who was then at Racine, come to New York and to give him a good appointment in the custom-house, with a share in the profits of the general-order business. Now, this is a witness's statement, not mine or that of the committee. But this I do say, that son did come to New York, and now has a good appointment in the custom-house under Mr. Smythe. I never charged that he participated in the profits of the general-order business; yet there are divers statements that it was the intention of Mr. Smythe that he should.

Here I dismiss the subject of the Senators and of Senator DOOLITTLE's son, with the simple remark that I feel authorized to say I have been advised in the last three days testimony might be had that would bring some of these matters to a yet more direct conclusion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to some charges that Mr. Smythe makes against this committee in the paper addressed to the President as to the manner in which they conducted the investigation, examination of witnesses, &c. He says:

"I was credulous enough to believe the committee when they informed me there was nothing before them which required contradiction or refutation on my part."

Why, sir, the committee never made any such statement to Mr. Smythe under any circumstances, in any shape, in any mode, in the remotest degree. The first witness which was sworn directly on his administration of his high office did give not mere presumptive or probable, but pointed evidence that he was flagitiously, corruptly, abusively administering his office. He continues:

"I was credulous enough to suppose that the testimony elicited in my favor, outweighing in quantity and quality all that which their ingenuity has garbled and distorted to my discredit, would go out with it. I was not enlightened as to their real purpose till they coined calumnies against you into interrogatories to me, and ordered their stenographer to suppress the indignant truth which nailed their false coinage to the counter."

This was addressed to the President of the United States.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to read the testimony on this question? I do not think it is applicable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is applicable. This is a committee of the last Congress, of which the gentleman from New York was chairman. His report has been assailed, and he now offers a resolution to revive the committee to continue the investigation. The Chair thinks it is in order for the gentleman to give the ground for the proposed action.

Mr. HULBURD. Mr. Smythe also states in his letter, and I wish to call the attention of the gentleman who objects to it, for I am sure no member of an American Congress can be expected to sit in silence when such a charge is made against a committee of which he is or was a member, like the following:

"Much of my testimony they forbade their stenographer to record. Part of what was recorded they have suppressed. All of it they have distorted."

That is a very grave charge to make against a committee of Congress. Whether deserved will be seen. This committee went to New York to do its duty, having no preconceived purpose to hunt up proof against the Executive of the United States or against his officer, Mr. Smythe. They went there to conduct an investigation. So far from suppressing the testimony, they gave Mr. Smythe the very broadest latitude. There is but a semblance, a shadow of a shade for the allegation that the stenographer was forbidden to record his testimony verbatim as he uttered it, and to that I will soon call attention. Mr. Smythe in New York was invited to come before the committee. He made the fullest statement he chose. Subsequently he came twice into the committee-room; he revised his testimony; he struck out from his testimony; he added to it whatever he pleased without any objection, without any hindrance, without any limitation in a single particular.

In proof of the manner in which the committee in that respect treated him and discharged its duty, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the statement of the stenographer who reported Mr. Smythe's testimony.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 14, 1867.

SIR: In reference to a published statement made by Mr. Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, that in the recent investigation held by the Committee on Public Expenditures in New York your stenographer was directed not to record part of his testimony, &c., I beg to say—having acted in that capacity—that I received no such directions from the committee. On the contrary, I reported Mr. Smythe's testimony verbatim.

You directed me to read Mr. Smythe's evidence for him when it was written out, and to allow him to make any alterations or erasures in it that he wished, and in accordance with your instructions I made whatever alterations and erasures in it that Mr. Smythe suggested.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN O'LOGHLEN.

Hon. C. T. HULBURD, late Chairman of the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. HULBURD. It seems to me that disposes of the question, so far as Mr. Smythe's testimony is concerned, that he was allowed the fullest liberty. As the reporter handed over the testimony written out so it went, without the change, addition, elimination, or interlineation of word or letter, as far as I have knowledge or belief, to the Public Printer.

In reply to some question, he said, on his first direct examination, that he had always voted the Democratic ticket. In the revision of his testimony he directed the stenographer to strike that out. I did not object to any emendation or to any alteration he chose to make. I regret the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] is absent. He conducted this examination of Mr. Smythe. If he were present he would verify in every respect the statement of the stenographer. As I said, there is a shadow of truth in one particular, that the stenographer was ordered not to take down one of his answers. Mr. Smythe was summoned before the committee a second time, and came to its committee-room, and when, among others, the question was put to him whether he had paid anything to Senators or their families, he had the flippant impertinence to say, "Yes, sir; I once gave Senator Patterson's lady forty cents' worth of candy," I thought we, if he had not, ought to have some regard for the office, some regard for this lady, with whom I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance, but against whom I have heard no human being speak. I regarded the answer unbecoming and disgraceful to use a lady's name in that pert manner, and I did direct the reporter not to take it down. I cannot believe any right-minded man will think I erred. I desire to submit to the House whether it is expected of a committee when conducting an examination to allow frivolous impertinencies and personalities to be injected into the testimony of witnesses? I ask whether it is the duty of the person conducting the examination to allow such things to take place? I suppressed it. That was the only suppression, to my recollection, that was made in the committee-room of Mr. Smythe's testimony. He charges, it is true, in his letter that we refused to record his answers in reference to the Executive of the United States and the questions we put to him. The letter I had read answers all that, and I only add there is not a particle of truth in the statement in that adulatory particular.

Sir, we had no hostility to the Executive on account of this appointment. I never heard his motives impugned for nominating Mr. Smythe. I never doubted but that he thought the merchants of New York preferred him of all the candidates suggested for the collectorship. And in this particular no doubt Mr. Johnson thought right and did right. The only error he has committed in this connection has been that he did not promptly remove him when his unfitness and unseemly purposes and practices became known as they did months ago. The exact figures and proposed distribution of the general-order business were put in my hands as far back as last July. But, as I have already intimated, it was not our mission to hunt up testimony against the President, and we had no such desire; and I do marvel when I think of it how Mr. Smythe, over his own signature, could allow himself to make such an unfounded statement before the American people.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the gentleman from New York to say he suppressed a portion of his testimony for the reason that he did not think it was in good taste. I wish to know how he justifies himself in now spreading it upon the records of the country?

Mr. HULBURD. He has made a specific charge against the committee, that we have suppressed testimony.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It was suppressed on account of the lady, I suppose, and in her behalf I inquire why now it is published?

Mr. HULBURD. It was suppressed on the ground it was impertinent and irrelevant. When he made the charge of suppression I deemed it but right that the character or nature of what had been suppressed should be made known in vindication of the committee.

I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I hold in my hand thirty pages of Mr. Smythe's testimony not sent to the printer. I do not know that it will be. It will not be unless the House so direct. It is his last examination. If he alludes to that and wishes this committee to unfold the nature of that examination, the nature of his connection with a former stenographer reporting for this committee, I am content. He was before the committee to give an account of his negotiations to obtain, and how he did obtain, copies of testimony taken before the committee. I am willing the country should have it and his explanation of the transaction.

Mr. CHANLER. Why does the gentleman suppress the testimony, then?

Mr. HULBURD. There are two or three reasons why this was not sent to the printer. The stenographer says the chairman of the committee said to Mr. Smythe, on his request, before sending it to the printer, he should have an opportunity to revise it; and I have not had an opportunity of submitting it to him; and after some experience I have had in letting go out of hand testimony taken, I have not proposed to send this testimony to New York for that purpose.

Another reason was this: the transaction to which it most particularly related, was surreptitiously obtaining from the committee's stenographer copies of testimony, by his own showing, I regarded most disreputable to an American gentleman, and, above all, utterly disgraceful to an officer of the Government, and as such I had purposed to let it slumber in the archives of the committee. But I do not know that I should forbear, and I will state the substance of it. The House is probably aware that stenographers are assigned to committees; they must take whoever is sent them. With a single exception, the Committee on Public Expenditures were fortunate in having faithful, competent reporters sent to them. A stenographer was sent to us in New York, and reported for us two or three days.

Before proceeding in this direction further just now, I must advert to another feature of the investigation. The committee desired the testimony of a Mr. Thompson, the early friend of Mr. Smythe, as his letter says, and, if I mistake not, connected at one time with the rebel Daily News, and I am not sure but a boarder in Fort La Fayette. The committee were desirous of having Mr. Smythe's friend testify before them. They sent a special invitation by the Sergeant-at-Arms to ask his attendance, but he could not be found. The committee directed a messenger to watch his house. He did so for twenty-four hours, but Mr. Thompson during that time did not enter it. We could not hear of his whereabouts. The committee adjourned, making and leaving for him a subpoena returnable at a future day. Within twenty-four hours after the committee adjourned Mr. Thompson was on "change," and was served with the subpoena. To that we are indebted to the fact that we were enabled to get his testimony.

The stenographer who reported for the committee before its adjournment lived in Brooklyn. After the adjournment of the committee he wrote out the testimony, and of course had in possession and control for two weeks or more the testimony and his original short-hand notes, and during that period made what use he pleased of them. When the committee resumed its session in New York Mr. Smythe came into the committee-room and asked if he could see his testimony and have a copy of it. I told him he could correct his testimony, but that we could not allow him to take a copy. Said he, "I can get a copy by paying for it in spite of the committee." I scorned the imputation, and told him I would like to see him do it. But, sir, the first thing I knew he did have a copy of certain portions of the testimony.

I first learned the fact here at Washington. I immediately took steps to procure the attendance of that reporter, who had already been dismissed by the stenographer of the House. He came here, and was asked how this testimony got out. He answered in these words, written down and signed by himself, and handed to me: "Some friend of Mr. Smythe's and mine advised him of my connection with the committee, and requested of me certain testimony which he specified as concerning him." The reporter said he was willing to make oath to the truth of this statement if required.

A MEMBER. What is the name of the stenographer?

Mr. HULBURD. Hemstreet. He stated that he also received two or three letters from Mr. Smythe, that he received so much money, and that he furnished to Mr. Smythe, at his request, the testimony of certain individuals. The committee then sent for Mr. Smythe. We did not ask the House to grant a warrant—as we were assured we might have properly done—to arrest him. We treated, or intended to treat him as a gentleman. We asked him, in the committee-room to state how he came by the testimony. The testimony which I hold in my hand is the result of that examination. I will not take the time of the House to read it. I will only say that he swore repeatedly before the committee that he had no knowledge that he was dealing with a reporter or any one connected with the committee of Congress, &c.

Now, sir, if the gentleman from New York does not see a reason why I did not care to spread out this blackening, disgraceful, damning record for Mr. Smythe, he has it from my lips.

Mr. CHANLER. My object in asking the question was to get the facts of the case. I could not see any reason for suppressing them. I certainly thank the gentleman very much for spreading them before the country so far as he has. I have no desire to defend Mr. Smythe or any other officer of the Government. I simply want to know why a chairman of so important a committee had suppressed a large portion of the testimony. He undoubtedly had good reason, as he has proved to the country.

Mr. HULBURD. The testimony is very voluminous. We examined over three hundred witnesses.

Mr. BARNES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HULBURD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARNES. I wish to ask if he has fully explained the charge he has previously made in his remarks with reference to the disreputable action of Mr. Smythe on that occasion. I wish to know if anything yet is suppressed in that gentleman's testimony before the committee?

Mr. HULBURD. As near as I understand it I will answer the question by giving Mr. Smythe's version of this transaction. Mr. Smythe swore that a female came to him at the custom-house on a certain day and offered for $200 to give him a copy of the entire testimony; that he rejected the offer; that the same woman came to him a second time and told him some of this testimony was very important to him, &c. He also said, in answer to an inquiry, that he did not ask her name, that he was a little afraid to touch that point; but he says that on a subsequent day some man called upon him at the custom-house, to him unknown, who submitted a roll of manuscript which had marked upon it so many dollars, with the words that if he would give that amount of dollars he could have that testimony. He testified that he handed over the money and took the manuscript and asked no question, and had no idea who the man was that gave it to him. That was the explanation which Mr. Smythe gave in the committee-room. I thought it my duty to call to his attention the grave matter in which he had been engaged in trifling with the testimony taken by a committee of this House, and which might have resulted in great embarrassment, to say the least of it, to the stenographer.

Mr. BARNES. I desire to ask if this gentleman who was on trial, and whose official acts were being investigated, had not a right to a copy of the testimony from the chairman of this investigating committee, and if, in the absence of being furnished by the chairman with the testimony, it was not a natural conclusion that he, being on trial before the country, should desire to have the testimony taken in this ex parte investigation?

Mr. HULBURD. I am not at this moment sure, although I may be mistaken, that Mr. Smythe ever applied to the committee for a copy of any of the testimony except his own. I may be mistaken, but if he had done so I should have refused his request.

Mr. BARNES. I understood the gentleman to say that he had applied for that testimony and it had been refused him.

Mr. HULBURD. He applied for a copy of his own testimony, not any more.

I would like now uninterruptedly to finish the closing up of this matter. I told Mr. Smythe in the committee-room that he might have got the reporter into difficulty, and instead of expressing any regret, instead of saying I was not aware of that fact, he had the audacity to say, "I would like to know the address of that reporter, for if he has got into any trouble in consequence of this matter I would like to send him my check for $500." That is precisely what he said. Well, sir, I sent to Brooklyn, where this reporter lived, to procure Mr. Smythe's letters to him. I do not know that Mr. Smythe ever saw the reporter or communicated with him in any way, but money is a mighty quickener and a mighty eraser of facts and figures and of human memory. I have learned, and I think others on this floor must have learned, that it often has a wonderful effect; it often operates with more effect than did the Lethean waters of old. The reporter said he was unable to find the letters, in fact he so wrote to myself. Perhaps, as he said, he had destroyed them. I know not whether Mr. Smythe ever did send him a check or saw him, on his prompt return to New York; but Mr. Smythe knew that he was the reporter if the reporter can be believed, and here is his testimony saying that he did not know he had any connection with the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I felt at liberty to trespass upon the time of the House, the testimony of Mr. Smythe before the committee on this occasion would be interesting reading in view of what he and others had already testified. I do not propose, however, now to go into that matter; but there are one or two things in his letter to the President which still claims my notice and is deserving of the attention of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to call for the reading of that whole testimony now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague has the floor for one hour, which will not expire for seventeen minutes.

Mr. HULBURD. I wish my colleague would allow me to go on with my remarks.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not wish to interfere with my colleague, but if he will allow me to do so I will make a motion that the testimony be read.

Mr. HULBURD. I cannot yield for that purpose. Mr. Smythe says in this letter that this office was never administered so efficiently or so economically as it is now, and that all the charges which the committee made in their report are entirely unfounded. He avers with reference to the removals that have been made that he has only "weeded out incompetency, ignorance, intemperance, and vice," and "filled vacancies with competent and honest men."

That is a most slanderous, audacious, incredible statement to be made by collector Smythe.

Why, Mr. Speaker, since last May and down to the 1st day of February last, that man has removed three hundred and eighty-one men from office, some, many of whom have grown gray in the public service, men of perfectly stainless character, men of intelligence, integrity, and character in point of probity, fitness for the respective positions held, the latchet of whose shoes he is not worthy to tie or unloose. Does Mr. Smythe intend to say that those three hundred and eighty-one removals were all of vicious, incompetent, and intemperate men? Does he mean to say that such was the character of the appointments made by Mr. Clinch, Mr. Barney, Mr. King, Mr. Draper, Mr. Schell, and others who have preceded him in that high office? I repeat it is not true if he does say it, and I declare here now on this floor that the number and the nature of the removals made by Mr. Smythe has embarrassed the transaction of business in the custom-house and utterly demoralized the public service there. The collector in his presidential letter, speaks feelingly of the wounds inflicted by the committee upon the hearts of those who were dear to him. No one could regret such result more than myself; but did Mr. Smythe forget that the three hundred and eighty-one removed men whom his letter virtually brands as incompetent, ignorant, intemperate, vicious, might also have those who were dear to each of them, and that such had hearts that could be pierced and lacerated by his remorselessly wholesale denunciation? During his term of office he had also, made up to February 1, 1867, one hundred and sixty-eight new or additional appointments.

He says he has put in competent and faithful men. When he removed or changed nearly the last of the old keepers of the public store-houses he certainly did not stop to find such qualifications as he enumerates. It was sworn before the committee that in one instance he had put in the place of a faithful, upright, competent man one not able when first launched to write his name in less than five minutes. Afterward by practice he was able to write it in three minutes, and finally he could sign his name in one minute. When he had so far advanced the witness afterward came into the committee room and asked to have struck from the record this statement of disqualification. That man is still a minor and hails by birth from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. CHANLER. Will my colleague state the name of that man?

Mr. HULBURD. I cannot yield now.

Mr. CHANLER. I did not know but he might have some long German name.

Mr. HULBURD. And in another instance in reference to inspectors, who in customs matters are charged with very responsible duties, and should be very competent and honest men, as I believe most are, he has removed officers who were perfectly honest and competent, and filled, in some instances, their places with very different men. He has put there at least one man, who is not able to speak a word of the English language. He has also appointed a man who at one time received $700 in gold duties, which he gambled away. Under a cloud for a while, he again turns up promoted to a higher and more responsible office, with a larger salary, and which he holds at the present time. Another man proven to have received at one time a five-dollar gold piece for passing baggage unexamined: he too has been singled out for promotion and is now one of the public storekeepers, having in charge millions of dollars per chance of merchandise. This, too, is one of his meritorious advancements. So, Mr. Speaker, I might go on showing up the character of some of these appointments, ad nauseam, till the time and patience of the House had been exhausted.

If any gentleman wishes to know how these appointments were made, I answer: sometimes, I am assured, by sheetfuls at a time, without even the names being read over; made, I suppose, at the beck or on the solicitation or recommendation of some dexterous if not veteran politicians.

Now, what is the effect of all this and of Mr. Smythe's own example of selling official patronage? Only last week an entry clerk or being remonstrated with for an excessive charge, by a merchant, justified himself by answering over his shoulder, "Ask Mr. Smythe if such is not all right." No doubt at this time that feeling actuates more or less to a considerable extent the working force in the whole customs service in the port of New York. In that respect—bribery in a small way—corruption generally reigns there, until his whole administration of the custom-house is reeking with corruption. His management of the bonded warehouse and general-order business denotes the most shameless, flagitious, disreputable, utterly disgraceful, yet deliberate system of abuse, extortion, wrong, that has been developed in scores of years. The force of example, the example of superiors, is contagious and potent, very.

Now, I deem it my duty to call the attention of this House, in connection with the committee's investigation, to another fact, most disreputable, and, in my judgment, meriting the severest reprehension. Two years ago the same committee of this House were instructed to investigate the affairs of the New York custom-house. Mr. Barney, the then collector, tendered the committee a room, which they did not accept; and he offered to send to the committee-room any of the employes and attachés of the custom-house on the simple request of the committee, without the formal-ity of a subpoena.

I could not but be struck with the different manner in which the committee of the last session were met in their recent investigation. Men came to me clandestinely, Nicodemus-like, and said, "Do not summon me before the committee; I shall be removed if you do; do not ask me to testify, for to do so will cost me my place." Others wrote letters to me to the same effect. Some, however, on being subpoenaed, did come forward and testified squarely, as honest men should. And what is the result? Perhaps precisely what might be expected, for Mr. Smythe himself said in the committee-room, not when testifying, but in his peculiar and expressive language, that he wished to God he knew who in the custom-house were stirring this thing up before the committee; for every one of them would be a head shorter within twenty-four hours.

Mr. Ogden, the auditor of the custom-house, was subpoenaed and testified before the committee. He has never written to me; he has never indirectly communicated with me since. But I have a letter here from another person, who writes that Mr. Smythe called Mr. Ogden before him and said that "it was damned strange that he should go before that committee and testify to figures which he never saw; that if those who ought to be his friends would not stand by him better he had a great mind to turn around and bite." Now, Mr. Ogden is an intelligent gentleman, and has been connected with the custom-house for nearly if not more than a score of years, if I remember aright; and yet Mr. Smythe threatens to remove him from his place because he testified before a committee of the American Congress.

Another deputy collector, Mr. Stedwell, on a subpoena issued by the committee, came before the committee and testified. Mr. Smythe now threatens to remove that man from office. Unless he and Mr. Ogden come out in cards and tone down their testimony, deny or swallow their words that they have uttered in the committee-room under oath, it is most likely they will one or both be removed.

Now, I submit whether this Congress can afford to allow this condition of things to continue; whether we are willing that a Federal officer in high position shall be permitted to denounce, threaten, and remove men for the crime of having answered to the subpoena signed by the Speaker of this House, and testified before one of its committees.

It might, perhaps, well be asked what meat hath this fledgeling official fed upon that he should dare thus to flout Congress, through its constituted committees, by the utterance to human ear or to the listening air of such an audacious motive and half-formed purpose.

Again, Mr. Smythe says: "The second charge the committee make against him is that of having, while the business of the custom-house is decreasing, increased the expenditures from $250,000 to $300,000 a year."

Mr. Speaker, my authority for that is the Treasury Department. Those are not conjectural figures. In the public stores alone the expense during the present year is $46,000 more than it was last year. It is sworn by one of the witnesses that only about four men can be well employed around a gangway; yet Mr. Smythe has so multiplied such appointees that at one time an average of sixteen men were standing around where only four could work. Of course the pay-roll is the object more than service; somebody's man wanted a place and the pay, and the collector, good easy soul, could not resist, until as I said, he has swelled the number to one hundred and sixty-eight additional.

The committee were taking testimony on this branch of the service, when hearing a large number of dismissals had taken place the committee hoped the abuse had been checked and would be corrected, and gave it no further consideration.

Mr. Smythe says again: "Another point they make against me is for having contemplated a distribution or farming out of the profits of the general-order business." Sir, the committee must take the testimony as they had it before them. The testimony was that Mr. Smythe did contemplate such a distribution. More than that, it is shown to compass it he resorted to most questionable expedients. In the month of May the Treasury Department was in treaty for what are termed in New York as the "Getty stores," which were desired for public stores. A negotiation was going on through a special agent of the Treasury Department, then in the city. It is said when Mr. Smythe had been confirmed he sent for Mr. Getty and assured him that the United States did not wish those stores, but that if those stores could be put in at $35,000—the Government was proposing at that very time to pay $45,000—he Smythe would go in company with Mr. Getty in the general-order business and would send all the general-order business there; that he could make it worth $100,000 per annum; that he did not himself wish to be known in the matter, &c. The Messrs. Gettys preferred to lease the stores to the Government. The special agent of the Treasury, knowing the stores were safe and commodious and every way desirable for Government use, much desired to obtain those stores. He asked a refusal from Saturday to Tuesday morning to enable him to write his views and get an answer back from Washington. It was granted; he wrote; Tuesday morning came, but no letter, and Mr. Smythe announced to Mr. Getty that no letter came, and he renewed his suggestion to go in company with Messrs. Getty and send the general order there. This was declined. Miller & Conger were directed by Mr. Smythe to rent the stores for general-order business. Now for the fact: the letter did come authorizing the leasing of the stores on Government account, and Mr. Smythe withheld the letter from the agent of the Treasury until the time agreed upon between the agent and Messrs. Gettys had passed, so that the stores could be had for general order as Mr. Smythe desired for himself and Gettys or for Miller & Conger, to whom he had conditionally sold the business for $40,000. He then, as I said, renewed his proposal to Mr. Getty to go into company with him. Somebody balked this pretty arrangement of the collector to thwart the Department in this matter, undoubtedly by reporting the facts to the Department. Be that as it may, orders came from Washington to refuse to bond the Getty stores. That was the reason the operation on the part of Mr. Smythe with Gettys and with Miller & Conger fell through.

Now, Mr. Speaker, can you conceive of a more disreputable and flagitious transaction on the part of a Federal officer than such an attempt to thwart the purposes of his chief and head to subserve his own pitiful pecuniary purpose? If that is not mean official duplicity, official betrayal of public interests, downright base treachery, I do not know how to characterize it.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Smythe has once a month since he has been installed in his present position taken an oath that he has never received anything, directly or indirectly, from the general-order business, from the cartage business, from the storage business, &c. Sir, it is in proof that Mr. Smythe, soon after coming into office, did have an account rendered to him for a fourth share of the cartage business, which amounted to $250 per month. When this was offered to Mr. Smythe, he said to his secretary, "I do not want to receive that money. You take it and keep it, and when I want it I will call for it." So he did not have it technically pass into his accounts or into his pockets. Thus he was enabled very consistently, very conscientiously, to take his monthly custom-house oaths that he had not received, directly or indirectly, because he had it not entered in his bank account or lodged in his pockets. Two months after Mr. Smythe says to his secretary, "Have you any money in your hands for me?" "Yes, sir."

"How much?" "Five hundred dollars." "Then give me a check for it." He gives him a check for it. Yet, sir, that man swears every month, and he swore before the committee, he has never received a dollar from that source; yet in his last examination by the committee he did admit that monthly pecuniary one fourth share did continue on up to the present time, inuring to somebody's benefit.

More than that. On one occasion he made a most noticeable statement. It was sworn by a gentleman whom I would believe as quickly as I would any living man. "I am damned sorry I ever undertook to carry the President's daughters." The profanity does not appear in the reported testimony; but I remember the exact words used. Mr. Smythe and this witness confronted each other in my own private room. Mr. Smythe, on being reminded of the expression, replied that he never said so; that he never thought so; that he never had any occasion to say so. I give him the benefit of his denial. The witness said to him directly, "I do not know, Mr. Smythe, what you thought; I do not know what occasion you had to say it; but I do know you used those very words."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD took the floor.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope my colleague's time will be extended.

Mr. WOOD. I do not object.

There was no objection; and Mr. HULBURD's time was extended.

Mr. HULBURD. Mr. Speaker, I have alluded to this testimony because of some denials elsewhere. I do not know any money ever went in accordance with it; but I do know from Mr. Smythe's own testimony that money did go to Washington. I do know from his testimony, as well as from that of others, that money did go to one or two ex-officials here out of this business in New York.

I wish to say, sir, I regard the transaction as abominable; I regard it as disgraceful; I regard it as demoralizing; I regard it as corrupt. I say that for a public officer to stand in New York and by arrangement with his agents, his ambassadors—and Mr. Thompson was his certified agent in some of these matters—to make an arrangement so that money could be filched from merchants and used here for any such imputed or suspected purposes, is more than an impropriety; it is, or ought to be, more than a misdemeanor, it should be treated as a crime.

Gentlemen ask me who is Mrs. Perry? I do not think she is a myth. Her veritable presence was proved more than once. It was in proof she was to share one third of the profits of this general-order business. A witness told me that if he had been asked the question he would have answered that Mrs. Perry had a written agreement to that effect, and that the President of the United States had read that agreement. The general-order business at that time was supposed to be worth from thirty-five to fifty thousand dollars a year.

Mr. Smythe makes another charge against the committee: that he had horrified the committee by an act of benevolence to this Mrs. Perry. He says when she came with a letter from the White House and asked for her share (by his own figures fixed at $3,000) he told her the arrangement had fallen through, but he did, out of pure benevolence, give her at certain times $300 or $500 out of his own pocket. No doubt this was all pure benevolence. Does he forget or suppose it not known that only a few days ago this same woman applied to him again by letter for more? What was the answer of this benevolent, honorable United States official? He sent her more money, and said he would continue to do so if she would keep out of the way of congressional committees. Was that charity? So far as the committee with which I am connected are concerned we never sought her acquaintance in the committee-room or elsewhere.

Now I turn to another point; and I desire to ask whether it is proper that the importers and business men of New York should be subjected to petty contributions and levies and extortions to make up sums for persons and papers in this city or elsewhere, to ex-officials, if not to officials in good and regular standing? I ask whether it is proper legitimate business should be black-mailed to a large or small extent for such purposes? I cannot but think this House owes something to the country, something to merchants, something to honest officials, something to its own dignity, to endeavor in some way to put a stop to all such things throughout the length and breadth of this land by rebuking all such practices, whether in high places or connived at in high places.

Sir, as a citizen of New York, in common with my colleagues, I feel proud of my State, an imperium in imperio in very deed. We feel proud of our Metropolitan city, whose wealth and commerce are the marvels of this continent. We know, we acknowledge, it has grown to what it is, not merely by its energy or the geographical position of our own State, but the tributary business of other States has built it up to what it is. The State has spread over all its surface a net-work of canal and rail improvements; its people and other people have used these avenues to carry seaward the magnificent achievements of skill and industry. This has made our commercial emporium great and potent, and enabled it to gather and clasp to its quickened breast the golden products of field and forest and mine and mountain, and enrichingly pour them into all the marts of trade and commerce of the world. In this purpose her ships visited every harbor of the seas, and brought home

"The wealth of Ormus and of Ind," to diffuse it over all our broad American lands. While this business was conducted legitimately and properly all rejoiced in our growth and prosperity. When dark times came, when

"The purple testament of bleeding war" was opened in the spring of 1861, when no man could pierce through the gloomy darkness and see what was beyond, then the merchant princes, the business men of New York, came generously forward and subscribed their millions to aid the Federal Government in conducting the war. Ay, they made the Government presents not only of money and steamships, but they sent their sons to do duty in the march, in the trench, and tented field. When pirate Alabamas were upon the ocean destroying their ships and burning their merchandise, when seemingly the American commerce was annihilated, when everywhere, from the far Orient,

"Where the golden gates of day to the furthest sunset wave of the West, there was scarce an American sail that dared to carry American merchandise beneath the American flag, and the merchants of New York felt that their Government, perchance, was not doing all it should and could to arrest these destroying ocean corsairs; they vented not their wrath but still opened their hands and did what was required to aid and sustain the Federal Government. At length peace came; they expected encouragement, and justice, and protection at the hands of the Government. Certes, they did not expect to see enthroned in their midst an official vampire to suck out little by little the life-blood of their business.
Open in the palmy East,"

Is it any wonder they complain of such treatment? They who pay $140,000,000 of gold duties yearly into the Treasury, and who have stood up and by the Government as they have for the last six years, surely deserve from its hands better than they are receiving. I do submit, under these circumstances, if it is proper or becoming for this Congress to allow this condition of things to continue.

Mr. Speaker, this committee have endeavored to do their duty in exposing these matters and directing attention to these abuses and corruptions. I am not aware that we prosecuted it with any personal vindictiveness or any unfairness. Of course we awoke animosity. I am well aware that we could have taken a different course, and all would have been lovely and smooth and of good report. Almost incredible means were resorted to, to induce the committee to take this course; if not to desist, to at least change, to modify, to tone down, and to suppress. Place has been offered, personal violence threatened; the spectacle of political slaughter held up to deter me, and all for a simple effort to do my duty and nothing more.

Sir, I have read a record of the olden time, whether of fact or fiction I know not, that upon the occasion of a frightful fissure opening in one of the principal streets of pagan Rome, and widening day by day, when the oracles were dumbfounded thereat, the college of soothsayers declared, "Cast into the crevice your jewels and it will close up." A single Roman knight spurred his steed into the yawning chasm and it closed up and the city was saved.

I do not for a moment suppose the sacrifice of my humble self could promote a large public good, and yet I feel and I say that if this report, considerably prepared, as it has been, and based upon ample evidence, as it should be, and I think is, shall produce the effect of bringing abuses and frauds to an end in the custom-house at New York, as well as in custom-houses elsewhere, and cast up such a buttress and highway that henceforth, for a season at least, honest men can hold office and business men can have their honest rights, Government its proper dues, without extortion or bribery or corruptions or abuse, I shall have small concern what may betide my single self. I am but a waif floating in the atmosphere, and it matters little when or where or perchance how soon the final lodgment is made.

Notwithstanding all menaces, and if I assuredly knew they would all overtake me, in the condition of things we found existing in and about the New York custom-house, I would censure any man whom I found positively responsible therefor. I would mercilessly condemn my brother or my father for such conduct. Nay, sir, if Gabriel himself had so conducted such an office, if permitted, he should be impeached therefor before Heaven's high chancery. If that utterance be esteemed irreverent, I trust the recording angel, a la Uncle Toby, will drop a tear upon it and blot it out forever.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that it becomes this House to show by its action that—

"Corruption wins not more than honesty."

I insist also that the President of the United States should beware lest he verifies Burns's couplet:

"Nae wonder he's as black's the grun, Observe wha's standing wi' him."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I admit that the report is a bad presentment for Mr. Smythe. I admit that it is a damaging and disastrous finding; I admit that the New York paper was correct that characterized it as a terrible indictment. But, sir, it is true, and believing it to be true, God help me I cannot go back of it!

I wish, in justice to the stenographers now present, to say I had no reference to reporters employed by the House or to the gentleman who has the superintendence of this whole business of reporting for the committees. In reference to the printing of the testimony of Mr. Smythe, I desire to follow the pleasure of the House. I have it here, and if it is the desire of the House that it shall be printed it is at their disposal.

Mr. WARD. I ask consent that the testimony in the hands of my colleague be printed.

No objection was made, and the testimony was accordingly ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANLER. Before my colleague [Mr. HULBURD] yields the floor, I ask him to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. HULBURD. I will yield to him if he desires to ask me a question.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not. I ask the gentleman to allow me five minutes.

Mr. HULBURD. Well, I will give him five minutes of my time.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to state in regard to this investigation that it brings before the House and the country truths sufficient to establish the necessity for a thorough reform in our civil service. I have no desire in speaking to this motion to defer the action of the committee if it can develop facts which will secure an honest administration of the public affairs of this country. If reform is to begin it should begin now, and nowhere can it begin with greater propriety than in the city of New York, or in the custom-house department of that city.

Nor was it necessary for the gentlemen composing the committee to assume in their report that they found the first proofs of corruption in the administration of this Government. Sir, it is an established fact in the history of this Government, from its foundation, that because the wise advice of Washington was not followed, because the organization of the civil service was not made distinct from political principles, we have gone on stumbling deeper and deeper in the mire of political filth until the women of the country, the highest department of our Government, are dropped down to the limit which this testimony discloses to the world.

I am an advocate of the reforms which the gentleman's report demand. At various times during the last Congress I presented for the consideration of the House a proposition bearing directly upon this question, and that proposition received scarcely a vote in this body as then organized. It was a proposition which struck directly at this system of corruption by stopping the system of black mail levied by political officials upon the humblest workmen in our navy-yards for political purposes. The House rejected my proposition, which was that no man employed in any department of the Government should belong to any political organization, or attempt directly or indirectly to influence the vote of any one in the Government service under him.

I suppose that this effort at reform is sincere and honest, and that it is not a partisan movement with a view to control the patronage of the Government. Without professing that motive I can understand that from the division in the Republican party it is desirable to remove the collector at New York. The whole country understands that. I do not rise here to defend that officer or his conduct, or in any way to palliate any act of his toward the committee, pertinent or impertinent. Let him suffer the consequences of his conduct, whatever they may be. But I cannot let this occasion pass without urging upon this House the necessity of a speedy reform, thorough and complete, of the civil service of this Government.

Mr. Smythe, so far as I know, has not been a member of any particular political party; and in striking him down no one suffers but his immediate and personal friends. So far as I understand his relations in public life, he has been connected with the Chamber of Commerce of New York. The error in his appointment was that a member of a special board for the protection of a particular interest was given the control of this office for that interest, when he should have been selected for the interest of the Government rather than the interest of merchants. That is the error of the whole system. By outside pressure the executive department of this Government is induced to appoint to high places men who are in the interest of particular parties and particular classes, and who are not put there for the public interest only.

Now, if the errors of the collector of the port of New York are venal, if he is to suffer decapitation, let the blow also fall on others as guilty as he. In the name of justice let him not suffer for the errors of a system which he found established when he came into this office. If he cannot resist the pressure brought to bear upon him in reference to the making of local appointments in the city of New York, that is not his fault any more than it is the fault of the Executive who under direct pressure makes him the collector of the port of New York.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD obtained the floor.

GOVERNMENT ORDNANCE.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to a privileged question, and submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs of this House be immediately appointed, and are hereby authorized to sit during the recess, for the purpose of inquiring into the manner of procuring heavy ordnance for the United States service, the disbursements relating thereto, as well as the quality of the rifled and smooth-bore guns heretofore introduced and hereafter to be introduced into the said service. The committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk, who shall receive the same compensation as heretofore allowed. And the Secretary of War is directed to cause experiments to be made, and to supply from stores on hand, the property of the Government, such ordnance as may be required by the committee for operations necessary for the determination of the questions before the committee; as well as to detail officers and enlisted men, such as may be found necessary. And the committee shall report by bill or otherwise whenever they deem such action expedient.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is in the nature of a privileged question, relating, as the first part of it does, to the organization of the House by the appointment of one of its standing committees, and instructing it as to its duties. But the Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that the latter part of his resolution directing the Secretary of War to make certain disposition of the property of the Government will not be operative unless put in the form of a joint resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. I will modify the resolution so as to request the Secretary of War to do so and so; and I will explain in a few words my reasons for offering this resolution. I do not know that I am better acquainted than are other members of this House with the manner of purchasing ordnance; but I have examined the subject until I know something of it and of the expenses to the Government. I had an opportunity for some years at one time to know something about the cost of ordnance in this country. If members of this House will take the trouble to ascertain the amount of money that has been appropriated for ordnance that is and always has been of no service to the Government, and for the purchase of ammunition to be used for guns which have never been used, they will see the necessity of placing this subject of ordnance in charge of some committee of this House, that they may, from time to time, make such reports as will require the House to take some action in reference to this question.

I do not desire to take up the time of the House by going into details. I merely ask that the Committee on Military Affairs, the appropriate committee to examine the subject, be charged as a part of their duty with the investigation of the ordnance department, making such examinations and experiments as the interests of the public service demand. It certainly seems to me that there can be no reasonable objection to this proposition. Were this the proper time to enter into a discussion of the subject, I could exhibit evidences of expenditures in this branch of the service so entirely contrary to sound judgment and a proper economy that they would surprise gentlemen of this House. The expenditures in connection with the ordnance of the country have never been revised or examined by any of the committees of this House. I hope that the resolution which I present will be adopted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that the Government has its proper officers for just the sort of duties he has suggested; and it seems to me that those officers are much better qualified (although I wish to make no imputation upon the ability of the Committee on Military Affairs) to perform this duty than are members of Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Government has its officers to examine this matter of ordnance; it has its officers for the purpose of making purchases and contracts; but the action of those officers is not subject to the revision of Congress through any committee. It is for the purpose of making a change in this respect that I offer this resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is for that very reason that I object.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, sir, I am interested in the Government having ordnance of the best quality at the lowest cost. If the gentleman from Wisconsin is interested differently I cannot help it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Not at all; but I have quite as much confidence in the officers of the Government having charge of this subject as I have in members of Congress. And further than that, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to have this Congress made perpetual, either by its committees or otherwise.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] in regard to the propriety of the general object which he has in view, though I am not certain that he proposes the best way of accomplishing it when he moves the reference of this subject to the Committee on Military Affairs, now to be appointed for this special purpose. I have prepared, and for several days have been seeking an opportunity to introduce, a resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee on ordnance, to which this whole subject may be referred. I shall, however, cheerfully sustain anything looking to the accomplishment of the object which the gentleman, in common with myself, has in view.

Let me say, for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] that one of the difficulties at present existing is precisely this: the great guns of the United States are now manufactured under patents issued to Army men and ordnance men, to whom a royalty is paid for the use of those patents. The projectiles which are purchased by the Government in large quantities, and in some cases at least not used, are the invention of men connected with the ordnance department. In the Navy, there is a very distinguished officer who is the inventor of great guns used in that Department of the Government. While this wrong exists, no mechanic, no inventor, can obtain a fair trial, by experiment or by introduction into the service, for anything that does not receive the approval of the charmed circle controlling this whole matter. The consequence has been the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars without any adequate return. The consequence has been the manufacture of guns which, though they stood that slow process of firing which is the only test to which they were subjected in target practice, burst by the dozen when they were used in battle, either for hammering down Fort Sumter or for an attack upon Fort Fisher.

The fact is that more guns were lost, or rather more men were killed, upon our own side by the bursting of our own guns at the bombardment of Fort Fisher than were injured on the part of the enemy we attacked with these guns.

However, I do not wish to go into the merits of this matter. Whatever course Congress may take in regard to the matter there is a crying evil here which should be brought under the supervision of the law-making power and corrected, if we wish to save any of this vast expenditure to the Government.

Without taking up further time, I will say that I had intended proposing a joint standing committee of both Houses. Perhaps the gentleman's object might be accomplished in that way. I am certain something ought to be done. I will propose this as an amendment to the gentleman's resolution, if he will allow it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will hear it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

RULE — There shall be appointed a joint committee on ordnance, to consist of three members of the Senate and three members of the House, to whom shall be referred all matters in relation to ordnance and ordnance stores which shall come in question and be referred to them by either House; and also to inquire into the expenditures of the ordnance bureaus of the War and Navy Departments, and to report from time to time such measures in reference to those subjects as to the said committee may seem advisable.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the gentleman is apprehensive if he makes it a concurrent resolution the Senate will not agree to it. If he insists on the Committee on Military Affairs we can authorize the Speaker to leave a vacancy or two on that committee, to be filled when the Representatives come from the other States.

The SPEAKER. No Speaker has ever yet learned, that the Chair is aware of, how to make fragmentary committees. If he is ordered to appoint a committee he will do so, and the House can add other members hereafter if they should see fit.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to make a single suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state his reason, as the gentleman from Ohio seems to dissent. If he leaves the second place on the Military Committee vacant, and the gentleman whom he expects and desires to see elected is not elected, the gentleman who shall be elected would claim that place. The Chair does not know how he is to appoint fragmentary committees without subjecting himself to endless complications.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will only say in defense of my suggestion that I do not see the difficulty. Everybody understands that the allusion is to Colonel Deming, my distinguished and valuable colleague, who stood second on the committee in the late Congress. If to our great regret, and a result which I will not permit myself to anticipate, but which is among the uncertain chances of an election, he should not be returned, there should be no objection, nor would it be just occasion of complaint, that another member should be placed, to fill the vacancy, either second, third, or even last on the list at the discretion of the Speaker. If the Chair will indulge me in making a remark, I will say if he ever expects there will be a time when Mr. Smith and Mr. Jones and all the various members of this House will be satisfied with the making up of the committees, then I am afraid he is waiting for a millennium which will never come.

The SPEAKER. The Chair expects no such millennium. When the duty devolves upon him of appointing the committees he will discharge that duty, of course subject to the censure of individual members. The Chair is not aware that any Presiding Officer has ever been compelled to make up fragmentary committees. He has consulted gentlemen who have held similar positions and who know the precedents, and they are unaware of the existence of any such instance. He is perfectly willing to appoint the Military Committee if the House sees fit; and the gentleman's resolution seems to take it out of the usual course.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the whole matter can be harmonized by making the ordnance committee a House committee. We can take it out of the course of joint action, and so arrange it as to control our own action.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think it ought to be referred to a special committee, because it imposes a special duty. I regard the Committee on Military Affairs as the appropriate committee for the investigation of matters of this kind.

Mr. BLAINE. At the close of the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress this House proposed to add to the standing committees a joint committee on ordnance, but the Senate failed to concur in it. Now, if the House of the Fortieth Congress will reaffirm its judgment for a committee on ordnance, the investigation proposed by the gentleman from Illinois can be prosecuted with more directness than through the Military Committee. And I beg to say, under the admonition of the Speaker, that I would be the last one desirous of inflicting an injustice upon a soldier like Colonel Deming. If the committee is appointed, and he is re-elected and loses his place, I happen to know that he has a great deal of feeling on that point.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the resolution moved by the gentleman from Illinois will pass, and I shall be glad to vote for the committee proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] One of the objects of this resolution is to ascertain whether there is reason for the appointment of a committee on ordnance. In regard to its appointment at this time there can be no difficulty whatever. It is perfectly competent, and certainly the House would be willing to make additions to the committee. It could be easily arranged by an order of the House that no member well skilled in the military affairs of the country should lose his place. I am certain that could be arranged in regard to this and in regard to other committees, so that there would be no difficulty.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand his name could be put in at a particular place or at the foot?

Mr. BANKS. The order can be made by the Speaker or the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the Speaker to decline to make it. The House might possibly instruct him; but he has twice admonished us that he did not regard that mode as practicable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has scarcely understood the Chair. The objection of the Chair was to making a committee and leaving the second place on it vacant, thus apprising the House of his expectation that if some person should be elected he would be appointed thereto, and in case of the resignation, absence, or death of the chairman of the committee the person thus appointed would become chairman. Now, if the Chair appoints a committee the House can order that a certain person be placed upon it.

Mr. BANKS. There is no difficulty in arranging this matter. Whenever other members appear it is perfectly competent for the House to order a rearrangement, and doubtless it will do so.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the gentleman ought to make his committee special. If you make a standing committee, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests, it will be idle to suspend that committee afterward. If it is a special committee it becomes functus officio after it discharges its duties.

Mr. LOGAN. When the House is fully organized by the appointment of all the committees, if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is desirous to have this investigation taken from that committee, then, at his suggestion, it may be done by resolution, and transferred to the other committee. There would be no objection to that at all; and if the House should think proper, there will be no difficulty in regard to the appointment of Colonel Deming on the committee, or any other gentleman.

As I remarked before, I have reasons that I have not time to explain for asking this committee to be appointed now; and I do not desire to be understood as reflecting upon any person in the ordnance department in offering this resolution. I desire that all the Departments of this Government shall be subjected to examination by committees of this House, and that such appropriations as are made from time to time by the House shall be subjected to scrutiny by committees, so that we may know whether the expenditures are properly or improperly made. No man ought to object to it. This is the only reason I have for offering the resolution. I am satisfied that the Departments expend a great amount of money, in regard to which neither Congress nor the people have any proper knowledge. I now move the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the Chair how this resolution got before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the Chair to ask for objection, and I made objection.

The SPEAKER. And then when the gentleman was conversing with others around him, the Chair stated that it was a privileged question, as it related to the appointment of one of the standing committees of the House.

Mr. ROSS. Would it be in order to move to postpone this till next week?

The SPEAKER. It will be after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope it will not be seconded.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 52, noes 49.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and LOGAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 57.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until the first Monday of December next, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 56, noes 51.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and BLAINE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 48.

Mr. BANKS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 56, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnes, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cornell, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Getz, Hayes, Holman, Chester D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Boutwell, Bromwell, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Callum, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Moore, Myers, Paine, Pile, Polisy, Raum, Schenck, Shellabarger, Stewart, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyok, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Broomall, Cake, Daves, Denison, Elliot, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Mercer, Morrell, O'Neill, Pike, Plants, Price, Robinson, Sawyer, Selye, Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, William B. Washburn, and Windom—36.

So Mr. BLAINE's motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the consideration of the resolution was postponed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 49) to repeal a joint resolution entitled "A resolution to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland," approved January 29, 1867; when the Speaker signed the same.

COST OF ORDNANCE, ETC.

Mr. LOGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House what amount of money has been paid by the Government since April 13, 1861, for cannon, ordnance, projectiles, and small-arms by the War and Navy Departments respectively; to whom the said money was paid, and at what dates; also at what time contracts were made under which such articles were furnished, with copies thereof; and also that he be requested to inform this House whether any officers or employees are or have been parties to any alleged improvement in cannon, ordnance, projectiles, or small-arms proposed or made by the Government in either of said Departments, or interested, either directly or indirectly, by patent-right for any alleged improvement in ordnance, cannon, small-arms, or projectiles; and whether any royalty or premium has been charged or paid to any officer or employee in the War or Navy Department for the use of such patent-right either by the Government or the manufacturer of ordnance, cannon, small-arms, or projectiles, with the particulars thereof.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in relation to aid by the national Government to the Northern Pacific railway; which were ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad when appointed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, also presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relating to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, &c.; which were ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the Committee of Commerce when appointed.

LAND WARRANT NUMBER 46318.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the issue of a patent on land warrant No. 46318, for one hundred and sixty acres, under the act of 1847; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands when appointed.

GOVERNMENT ORDNANCE.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the following resolution, upon which I call the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs of this House be temporarily appointed, and are hereby authorized to sit during the recess, for the purpose of inquiring into the manner of procuring heavy ordnance for the United States service, the disbursements relating thereto, as well as the quality of the rifled and smooth bore guns heretofore introduced and hereafter to be introduced into the said service. The committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk, who shall receive the same compensation as heretofore allowed. And the Secretary of War is requested to cause experiments to be made, and to supply from stores on hand, the property of the Government, such ordnance as may be required by the committee for operations necessary for the determination of the questions before the committee, as well as to detail officers and enlisted men such as may be found necessary. And the committee shall report by bill or otherwise whenever they deem such action expedient.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will modify his resolution so as to provide for the appointment of a select committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the resolution. The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question, as the Chair ruled on a former occasion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not in effect providing for the appointment of a select committee?

The SPEAKER. It provides for the appointment of one of the standing committees of this House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is not this in effect the same resolution which the House voted down a few minutes since?

The SPEAKER. The other resolution was for the permanent appointment of the Committee on Military Affairs; this provides for its temporary appointment.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 57, noes 50.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. PILE called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire of the Chair, if the motion to lay on the table should not prevail, whether it would then be in order to move to amend the resolution so as to provide for the appointment of a select committee?

The SPEAKER. That motion would then be in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 56, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnes, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cornell, Driggs, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Getz, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Julian, Kerr, Kitchin, Koontz, Marshall, Marvin, Miller, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Poland, Pomeroy, Prayn, Randall, Robertson, Scofield, Silgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Van Aiken, Van Tromp, Henry D. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Boutwell, Brewster, Buckland, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Fields, Finney, Gravelly, Halsey, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Moore, Myers, Paine, Pile, Polsley, Raum, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Delos B. Ashley, Baldwin, Broomall, Cake, Dawes, Denison, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Mercar, Morrell, O'Neill, Pike, Platts, Price, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Selge, Stevens, Stewart, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Ward, and William B. Washburn—42.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RICHARD C. VAUGHAN.

Mr. NOELL asked and obtained leave for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Richard C. Vaughan.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred a bill to provide for the adjustment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliation committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801.

Mr. SPALDING and others objected.

CAPTURED COIN AND BULLION.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, to which had been referred a resolution directing an inquiry to be made as to the proper disposition to be made of certain coin and bullion now on special deposit in the United States Treasury, submitted a report in writing, accompanied by a joint resolution, to cover in the Treasury certain coin and bullion.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that the one hundred thousand dollars or thereabouts, in coin and bullion, now on special deposit in the Treasury of the United States, shall be sold by the Treasurer of the United States, and the money derived therefrom covered in the Treasury; and that the claimants thereto, the Richmond banks, may contest their right to the same in the Court of Claims.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I call the previous question on the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was as follows:

The joint select Committee on Retrenchment, to which was referred the claim of the Richmond banks to certain coin and bullion now on deposit in the United States Treasury, make the following report:

On the 14th of March, 1865, the Legislature of Virginia passed an act authorizing a loan to the Commonwealth of $300,000 in gold and silver coin by the several banks, and the application thereof to the use of the army of northern Virginia, authorizing the auditor "to pay over the same, on the footing of a loan to the confederate States, either to the secretary of war or to the general-in-chief of the confederate army, as the Governor may deem most expedient, to be used exclusively for the purpose of procuring subsistence for the army of northern Virginia;" directing the Governor "to obtain from the confederate authorities the best securities they may have in their power to offer." Accordingly seven banks furnished $300,000, receiving State bonds as security therefor; $100,000 is now in the Treasury of the United States, and is the subject of this report. The money was deposited by the State to its credit in three banks, then public depositories, as follows: Bank of Virginia, $108,000; Farmers' Bank, $112,000; Exchange Bank, $80,000. The secretary of the confederate treasury caused to be delivered to the Governor of the State the following order:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT C. S. A.,
RICHMOND, March 28, 1865.

SIR: The State of Virginia has advanced $300,000 in coin to the Government for the use of the commissary department, and agrees to receive in absolute payment for the same cotton at the rate of fifteen cents per pound. You are hereby authorized to give an order to the fiscal officer of the State for two million pounds of cotton in payment of the same, &c.

G. A. TRENHOLM,

Secretary of the Treasury,
A. ROANE, Esq., Chief Produce Loan Bureau.

Captain Strother, of the confederate army, had authority to receive the $300,000. Just before the evacuation of Richmond he did receive $271,000, the banks retaining $29,000. He disbursed $25,000 at Richmond, leaving $246,000, of which $54,000 were in checks drawn by the Bank of Virginia and the Exchange Bank on their branches at Lynchburg. Captain Strother left Richmond on the 2d of April, 1865, with this sum of $246,000 under his control, in company with officers of the banks, who had in charge between two and three hundred thousand dollars in coin belonging to the banks, each party in control of its own funds.

At Danville, on the 8th of April, Captain Strother agreed with the officers of the banks that in the event of his being cut off from General Lee's army he would restore the remainder of the funds to them, to be credited on the bonds of the State which the banks then held. They then proceeded to Washington, Georgia. Captain Strother on the 21st of April, 1865, had remaining $223,929, which he paid to the bank officers, taking a receipt for the same, stating that the same should be credited on the bonds, "provided the said coin and specie checks shall be delivered in Richmond." There was no statute authority authorizing this payment by Captain Strother. The bank officers canceled and destroyed the checks, and held the remainder of the fund, together with their own coin.

In May, 1865, the banks of Richmond obtained a permit from General Patrick to bring back their effects from Georgia, and started with the coin, about four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Of this $170,000 was of the fund received from Captain Strother. About eighteen miles from Washington they were robbed by confederate soldiers disguised in Federal uniforms of $250,000 in coin. Of this $105,000 belonged to the Bank of Virginia; $145,000 had belonged to the Strother fund. The day after the robbers restored to the bank officers $111,000. Of this one bag of $9,000 was identified as the property of the bank; the remainder could not be so identified. After paying expenses the fund recovered amounted to about one hundred thousand dollars—subsequently delivered to General Steedman at Augusta, and now on special deposit in the United States Treasury.

This matter has been several times argued by attorney for claimants and Government before the Secretary of the Treasury and President. The above facts are those agreed upon at the last argument.

The bad faith commenced by Captain Strother was continued by the banks. At one time the petition stated "that there existed no contract or dealings between the banks and the confederate government by which it was entitled or had any interest in one dollar of the money in question." The officers of the banks verified by their oath this statement, yet its error is apparent from their own subsequently admitted facts. They also furnished affidavits from the officers of the confederate treasury department that the coin had not been under their control. From these allegations the Solicitor of the United States Treasury then said: "As to any interest of the confederate government in the coin, the only reason for supposing any such ever existed appears to be the fact that the coin was removed from Richmond simultaneously with the departure of the rebel authorities therefrom; but this was certainly in no way inconsistent with the private ownership asserted. The latter is directly and positively asserted by the sworn statement of the officers of the banks applying, and the former is negatived so far as it will could be by the statement of a person in the employ of the rebel treasury department." The President of the United States then issued an order for the restoration of the coin to the banks on certain conditions, which, in the judgment of the Treasurer, were not complied with.

Certain United States officers were still suspicious, and satisfied that the coin had belonged to the confederate government, when it was at last discovered that the negotiation had been carried on with the confederate war instead of treasury department.

The concealment and duplicity on the part of the banks show the character of their claims.

There can be no dispute that the banks loaned the State of Virginia $300,000 in coin, expressly to be advanced to the rebel government. The banks received State bonds as security, and the State received a confederate order for two million pounds of cotton in payment. The contract was complete in law. From that moment the coin became forfeited to the United States Government.

Before the 21st of April, to wit, on the 9th, Lee had surrendered. On the 18th, Johnson had commenced negotiating for surrender; the chief of the confederacy was disguised and in flight; the headquarters of the rebellion, with all its hopes and treasure, were in an army wagon hastening to get beyond the Mississippi. It is idle to pretend that Captain Strother had the shadow of right to act as administrator of the effects of the dead confederacy and defraud this Government of its legal spoils of war. After the surrender of Lee all the property of the confederacy by that act passed to the control of the United States Government.

Strother had no more right to give to the Richmond banks $223,929 than he had to give them two hundred and twenty-three thousand muskets had they been in his possession. It was a fraud upon this Government. The agents of the banks were participes criminis, and the banks should not receive any benefit therefrom, no matter what became of the property afterward. It was a conversion for the full amount at the time they took it.

The coin taken from Strother, with their own, was safely deposited in Washington, Georgia, by the banks' agents. They had no right to attempt its removal to Richmond, and therefore became liable to the Government for the amount, no matter how lost. It would be an easy matter to have a robbery by concert. The robbers took $145,000 of the Strother fund and $105,000 of the bank money. How did the robbers get a knowledge of the facts, and by what reason did they return $111,000, a few thousand more than the bank fund stolen? Had the banks succeeded in putting in their vaults at Richmond the $223,929, would they not have been clearly responsible to the United States in that sum? They have no claim to the $100,000 now on deposit in the United States Treasury, but should be held liable for the $29,000 retained by the banks from the $300,000, for the checks they destroyed of $54,000, the actual amount of coin they saved of the Strother fund, $25,000, and the balance taken by the robbers and not restored.

The banks owned no bullion. No part of the $300,000 loaned to the confederate government was in bullion; yet a part of the $100,000 are fifty-seven pieces of bullion, evidently taken early in the rebellion from the United States mints at Charlotte and Dahlonega.

Mr. KOONTZ. If the gentleman from New York will yield to me, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the House will second the demand for the previous question, I shall have no objection to yielding for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. PAINE. I would inquire of the Speaker how this happens to be a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. Because the committee was authorized to report at any time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] intends to let this subject go over for action hereafter, not under the operation of the previous question, I shall make no objection; but I do not want the matter to go over under the operation of the previous question, cutting off all other business on Monday until this question is disposed of.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is necessary that action upon this matter should be promptly taken by the House, so that it may receive the concurrence of the Senate at this session. It was not my purpose to prevent a proper examination and discussion of this question; but I will explain why it is necessary that there should be early action on the subject. This gold now in the Treasury was by the President, probably without a full examination of the fact, ordered to be delivered to the claimants, the Richmond banks, upon condition that they should file certain securities with the Treasurer of the United States. The securities offered were not deemed by the Treasurer sufficient, and he refused to deliver the gold. It is necessary that there should be some action of both Houses of Congress before the close of the present session, so that this gold may not be transferred to the vaults of these banks until their right to it shall be satisfactorily established before a court of justice.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will allow me to ask why it will not answer every purpose to pass a joint resolution declaring that the gold shall remain in the Treasury until further action on the part of Congress? My objection to this resolution is based upon that provision which proposes to carry this question to the Court of Claims. I do not know what may be the precise operation and effect of that provision. It may enlarge the jurisdiction of that court so as to reach and cover other cases.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It does not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I simply desire that Congress by its action shall compel the Treasurer of the United States to retain possession of this gold until further action on the part of Congress.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The effect of the joint resolution is to leave the decision of the question where it should be, with the Court of Claims. We propose that this money shall remain in the Treasury, and that these claimants shall go before the Court of Claims and establish, if they are able, their right to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The reference of the question to that court is what I object to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have no objection to an amendment of the resolution so as to strike out the provision referring the question to the Court of Claims. This will conform to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COOK. I rise to a question of order. The resolution reported by the committee must come before us as a substitute for the resolution introduced by myself and referred to that committee; and the question must first be taken, I submit, upon agreeing to the substitute reported by the committee for the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. When a bill is referred to a committee they can report it back with a substitute, or report back another bill which they themselves desire to have passed. The rule does not compel them to report back the bill referred to them unless it be a Senate bill, and that must be reported back because it is the action of another body. A House bill can be reported back or not in the option of the committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to amend by striking out of the joint resolution these words: "and that the claimants thereto, the Richmond banks, may contest their right to the same in the Court of Claims."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOK. I move to amend by providing that the coin shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States instead of being sold.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There are also included fifty-seven pieces of bullion, which I suppose will have to be sold.

Mr. COOK. I will also include the bullion, as it is as good in the Treasury as the coin. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN WYCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LOGAN moved that indefinite leave of absence be granted to Mr. RAUM, who is called home by sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. PHELPS, for two days.

HENRY A. SMYTHE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I send up to be read for information a resolution which I shall offer when I get the opportunity.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of this House be instructed to inquire into the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, in connection with the administration of his said office and in connection with his testimony and proceedings as a witness before the Committee on Public Expenditures of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, directed to examine into matters relating to the New York custom-house; and if, in their opinion, they shall find that said Smythe has been guilty of bribery or other crimes or misdemeanors the committee is instructed to report by articles of impeachment, or otherwise, to the House; and that said committee have authority to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses, and to sit during the sessions of the House and during any recess of Congress; and that they be also authorized to use the testimony already taken by said Committee on Public Expenditures relating to the administration of affairs in the New York custom-house.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved that the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 76.

Mr. NICHOLSON demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The House again resumed the consideration of Mr. HULBURD's resolution, on which the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not intend to enter into any discussion upon this subject. I am sure the hour and a half my colleague devoted to it has given the House a sufficiency of the New York custom-house affairs for this day at least. I will only say, therefore, that up to the present time, up to the report of the committee of which my colleague is chairman, the collector of New York had a reputation and a character as a merchant, as a banker, and as a citizen beyond reproach; and it is due to the President of the United States, whether the facts alleged in this report be true or not, to say, as I say now, that no Federal appointment ever received so strong, so high a financial indorsement as that of Mr. Smythe, who is now arraigned before the country. He was not appointed collector of the port of New York until the Chamber of Commerce of New York and the president of almost every one of our banking institutions and the almost entire mercantile community were united in his support.

I say this much not with any desire or intention of impugning the facts alleged in that report, nor with any design or intention of defending Mr. Smythe against these serious charges of crimes and misdemeanors. I have not the slightest intention of impugning the statements of my colleague, [Mr. HULBURD,] whose reputation here, and indeed in his own State, is beyond reproach. But, sir, it is due to every individual who is accused, and especially to a gentleman holding the high position of collector of customs for the largest collection revenue district in this or any other country, that he should not be thus tried and condemned upon ex parte testimony; but that before he is pronounced guilty he should have the privilege which is awarded to the meanest criminal in the lowest criminal court of our country.

Now, sir, so far as Mr. Smythe is concerned I do not know him personally. I never exchanged a word with him in my life. I have never made an application to him for any official favor, and I believe I have not a friend holding an office in the custom-house in New York. But, sir, I am satisfied that he is totally unfit for the office that he now holds. I am satisfied upon the evidence presented by this committee, whether the criminal charges are sustained or not, that he has not the capacity, certainly not the discretion, to fill a place of that magnitude and importance. He is no politician, he is not equal to the emergency in which he has been thus placed by this investigation. I have no doubt he has been the victim of sharpers in the city of New York. I have no doubt this committee have truthfully portrayed things which are disgraceful to the administration of the affairs of the custom-house in our city; but, sir, I believe many of these things are susceptible of explanation. I believe it is quite possible for some of the two or three thousand subordinates under that public officer to be guilty of criminal acts before the law and before the country for which, though the principal may be held responsible, he may nevertheless be innocent of any willful or criminal action himself.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the House and of the country to this fact: that it is impossible with the complicated revenue laws which govern the collection of the revenue not only in that, but in every other collection district in the country, for any collector to be cognizant of the things that are transacted around him. It is beyond the capacity of any man to go into the office of collector of the port of New York and discharge the duties without committing errors, or without being liable to some extent to the same accusations that are made here against this man. It is in consequence of the defects in our laws. For the last sixty years we have been passing one revenue law after another until we have made confusion worse confounded, so that the ablest lawyer in the country could not be qualified with less than six months' practical experience for the duties of the office, so as to be able to discharge them without serious errors. Mr. Smythe is a merchant, educated as such. He knew nothing of law, and was unfitted for an important executive trust. Not knowing what to do, not suspecting he was surrounded by thieves, he entered upon the discharge of his duties, and the exhibition which we now have proves more in my judgment his want of fitness for the position than his want of personal integrity.

It has been alleged by the chairman of the committee that Mr. Smythe said he was a Democrat. Sir, I think I know the Democracy of the city of New York, and I state on my own personal knowledge that he has never voted the Democratic ticket there.

Mr. HULBURD. I think I stated that he first testified before the committee that he had always voted the Democratic ticket; but when he came to revise his testimony he directed the stenographer to strike out a portion, which was done.

Mr. WOOD. Whatever may have been the gentleman's politics, he has never been identified with the Democratic party, but he has been a liberal contributor to the Republican fund of the city of New York. He has been prominent upon all political occasions in antagonism to the Democratic party, belongs to the Loyal League, and is at this time a member in good standing. [Laughter.] Therefore, so far as the attempt of my colleague to throw any odium upon the Democratic party growing out of this horrible exhibition is concerned, I throw it back upon him. I do not desire to make his political party responsible for the moral aberrations of one man; yet if that argument can be sustained he may have the benefit of the appointment. We do not want it.

In the early part of this session I offered for the consideration of this House a resolution proposing the appointment of a select committee to examine and revise the laws for the collection of revenue in this country. I did that after reading the report of my colleague [Mr. HULBURD] upon this subject. In my judgment that report is more important to Congress in exposing the defects of our existing laws than it is in attacking an individual officer. I hope the members of this House will read that report carefully, as well as all the testimony which we have not yet been permitted to read.

They will then see how much our great and important commercial interests are at the mercy of the collector of New York and of his creatures and subordinates. They will see, for instance, how a man who pays into the public Treasury from one hundred to five hundred thousand dollars a year in the form of duties may have his commercial credit ruined and his moral character destroyed merely by a subordinate of the custom-house walking into his counting-room, charging him with an attempt to defraud the revenue, and closing his place of business. We have an instance cited in this report where $70,000 worth of wines were suddenly seized and the character of the importer was destroyed. And in order to be allowed to resume his business the importer submitted to be black-mailed to the extent of $12,000 in gold; thus purchasing as it were the privilege of continuing his business by submitting to an extortion on the part of Government officials.

And here let me call the attention of the House especially to the inducements offered by the law for such practices. A certain portion of the property seized is to be distributed to the informer in the first instance; that in itself is an odious principle and wrong. Secondly, the collector, the surveyor, and the naval officer are allowed to divide among themselves another portion of the property seized; and thus a premium is offered for rascality. It is almost beyond the power of an honest man to remain honest in an office where he is allowed by law the opportunity of thus amassing a fortune of millions of dollars within the four years of his term of service. The temptation is too great for poor human nature. And from the days of Swartwout, who stole $1,500,000 in one year, down to the present time, I do not believe any occupant of that office could stand up and defend the acts of all subordinates under him in reference to these seizures.

And I would say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that if he would take a more elevated and statesmanlike view of this whole question he would bring forward a proposition to remedy the law, so as to take away from the individual the temptation to commit these outrages upon the merchants of the country, upon the Treasury, and upon the Government. That is the defect of the existing law, and I call upon this Congress before its adjournment, either at this session or at the next session, to do something to remedy the defect of the law.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] will allow me, I will say that at the last session the law was changed in a very important particular, by requiring all the duties upon the article to be first paid and deducted before the division shall be made to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. WOOD. I am aware of that. But that is a very slight amendment; it is only the difference between gross receipts and net receipts, and it is a picaune way of remedying a fundamental difficulty in the law itself. There is nothing in that change of the law which would prevent a collector of a port or a surveyor or the naval agent or any deputy or inspector or subordinate, however humble, from walking into the gentleman's counting-room or into mine, and seizing the whole establishment and confiscating it at once upon the charge of attempting to defraud the Government and taking to himself a share of the proceeds.

Now, we want an entire revision of the laws relating to the collection of revenue. We want not only the codification of the laws which have been directed, but we want a revision and condensation of them; we want them all put in one general law, with provision for economizing the expense of collection, taking away from the public officer all inducements for imposition upon the importer and injury to the public Treasury. These are the important requisites which the public interest demands from the hands of Congress, and when we have done that we will have no more such reports as this which has been made in relation to the collector of the port of New York.

Sir, with reference to Mr. Smythe, I will say that until this report was made, until this investigation was instituted by Congress, and until its results were spread before the country, that gentleman's personal character was beyond reproach, and this proceeding only proves that however a man may be, however far above suspicion, the very moment he is called upon to fill a public office he is suspected of wrong doing and corruption. That, sir, is the radical defect in the organization of our civil service; a public servant is suspected of being dishonest as soon as he assumes his position. But, sir, it is not our duty to correct the morals of the people. I can only say that since the present occupant of the White House has occupied his present position this broad avenue has been thronged with applicants to get appointments for political considerations. In this case the President rose above all partisan claims and met the wants of the mercantile interests of the country, as expressed through the Chamber of Commerce of New York. If the collector whom he thus appointed has proved a traitor to his country, has indulged in corrupt practices, and thus brought disgrace upon his family and friends, it is but an additional instance of what is occurring in this country every day.

Sir, I do not defend the collector of New York from the charges made against him in this report. I am ready to admit that every word stated in this report is literally true. I believe that the gentleman who headed this committee could not be induced under any circumstances to bring in the report unless he believed every word of it to be true. But let us learn from this our duty as legislators. We are not the executive head of the Government. The responsibility of such appointments as these rests in the Executive, and if the President be not true to his duty—I was about saying he could be impeached. But if the facts stated in this report be true, and the President believes them to be true, I believe that he will do his duty. The collector of the port of New York is a subordinate officer of his; let him hold him to strict responsibility. I am for letting every department of this Government do its own duty within its legitimate sphere.

If there be any principle of our Constitution more clearly defined than another, it is that there are three coordinate independent branches of the Government, a legislative power to enact laws, a judicial power to construe the laws, and an executive power to administer them. Do not let us encroach upon the functions of the executive power. Do not let us recall the days of the French Convention or of the Long Parliament of England by usurping executive powers; let us do our duty strictly within the legitimate sphere of the Constitution, and trust to the coordinate branches of the Government to do their duty within the same sphere.

Mr. HULBURD. I now demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. ROSS. Would it be in order now to move to postpone the further consideration of this question?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order if the previous question be not seconded.

Mr. ROSS. I think we had better postpone this matter.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon agreeing to the resolution of Mr. HULBURD, which was again read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be requested to appoint the Committee on Public Expenditures, and that said committee, when appointed, take into consideration a report made at the last session by such committee on the subject of the New York custom-house, and report what action, if any, is advisable in the premises.

The resolution was agreed to—ayes seventy-one, noes not counted.

Mr. HULBURD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HULBURD. I desire to say that I wish the Speaker to waive in this case the courtesy of putting the mover of the resolution upon the committee. For four years I have acted as scavenger among the filth and garbage of the investigations to which I have been assigned; and I would beg now to be excused.

The SPEAKER. By the parliamentary usage, as well as by the fact of the gentleman's previous service on the committee, the Chair would feel it his duty to appoint the gentleman unless the House excuses him.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House would not excuse the gentleman, but will put the motion if the gentleman insists upon it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now offer the following resolution, which has already been read for the information of the House:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of this House be instructed to inquire into the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, in connection with the administration of his said office, and in connection with his testimony and proceedings as a witness before the Committee on Public Expenditures of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, directed to examine into matters relating to the New York custom-house; and if in their opinion they shall find that the said Smythe has been guilty of bribery or other crimes or misdemeanors, the committee is instructed to report by articles of impeachment or otherwise, to the House; and that said committee have authority to send for persons and paper, to examine witnesses, and to sit during the sessions of the House and during any recess of Congress; and that said committee be also authorized to use the testimony already taken by the said Committee on Public Expenditures relating to the administration of affairs in the New York custom-house.

Mr. Speaker, since the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HULBURD], requiring the immediate appointment of the Committee on Public Expenditures, I am disposed to modify my resolution so as to devolve upon that committee the duty of making this investigation and report.

I have but a very few words to say upon the propriety of instituting, or rather continuing, this investigation. After the exposé which has been made, with the references to the testimony and the records, in regard to the conduct of this collector at New York, it seems to me there remains nothing for the House, and there ought to remain nothing for him, except to demand an investigation which shall determine whether this is not a case coming within the contemplation of that requirement of the Constitution which imposes upon Congress the duty of impeaching the President, the Vice President, or any other civil officer of the United States who may be guilty of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." I am disposed to believe there is no other way of getting rid of this man. I am afraid that these very exposures will only make the President cling more closely to him. However that may be, Mr. Smythe occupies an exceedingly prominent and most responsible position before the country. As collector of the port of New York, he is a civil officer who in importance stands second only, if second, to a member of the Cabinet of the President. Through that custom-house and under his supervision passes a very large proportion of all the revenues by which this Government is sustained. But, sir, where such developments have been made in connection with an official holding an office of such consequence, I need not urge upon the House the obvious importance of measures looking to impeachment, if impeachment is in any case to be instituted against any civil officer whatever.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me one word?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire simply to express my preference for the prosecution of this investigation by the committee that has already had charge of the subject. My view on this point is founded partly upon the fact that the gentleman who has heretofore served as chairman of this committee will be able to elicit testimony which will throw some new light on this question and exhibit facts of which the House has now no knowledge. I think that is the motive which actuated the chairman in having the committee revived. I think it is due to him that he should be allowed to place himself right, to vindicate himself before the American people. He has been assailed, and he should be permitted to carry out what he has already so well begun.

Mr. SCHENCK. My friend did not observe when I first rose that I expressed my purpose to modify my resolution and to put the duty on that committee instead of the Committee on the Judiciary. When the resolution was first prepared hurriedly at my desk we had no committee appropriate to the duty except the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest whether it is in accordance to precedent or according to any rule of procedure to send a resolution looking to impeachment to the Committee on Public Expenditures? It should be, it seems to me, a special committee. It may be constituted of the same gentlemen for aught I know or care. I should be glad if it were so.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know there is any precedent on this subject. I suppose the power of Congress over this subject in every sense is potential. We have usually had Committees on the Judiciary, because in the few cases where there have been impeachments they have been of judicial officers.

PRINTING OF THE BANKRUPT LAW, ETC.

Mr. BARNES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which under the law was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That twenty-five thousand copies of the bankrupt law, ten thousand copies of the amended internal revenue law, and ten thousand copies of the amended tariff bill on wool and woolsens, as passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, be printed for the use of the members of the Fortieth Congress.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE—AGAIN.

Mr. WOOD. Do not the rules define the duties of the committees?

The SPEAKER. They define the duties of the committees, and then they generally say that they shall consider such other matters as may be referred to them. The Clerk will read from page 165 of the Digest the rule in reference to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The Clerk read as follows:

85. It shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures to examine into the state of the several public Departments, and particularly into laws making appropriations of money, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments and the accountability of their officers.

Mr. WOOD. I submit that rule cannot be construed so as to give that committee power to present articles of impeachment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order upon two grounds. The committee are directed to examine into the several departments of the Government, and the collector of the port of New York is one of those departments and a very important one. The second ground is that while this rule declares what shall be the specific duty of the committee, the Chair has no doubt the House can order the committee to do anything it pleases.

This is only preliminary to the preferring of articles of impeachment. This only gives to the committee authority to present to the House articles of impeachment. It gives to the committee no more power than the rules now give to the gentleman himself. He may present articles of impeachment against any officer of the Government, and if the House sees fit they can adopt them without referring them to any committee.

Mr. WOOD. There is no precedent where the Committee on Public Expenditures has ever been authorized to do this thing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection bears the gentleman out in that statement.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have simply provided that the committee may report by articles of impeachment or in any other shape they may see fit. Until the House adopts such report, either in the shape of articles of impeachment or otherwise, it will have no validity. But I will strike out that part of the resolution which speaks of articles of impeachment, so as to require the committee to report, leaving the House to determine whether articles of impeachment shall be adopted or not.

Let us see how this matter stands. The committee made an inquiry into the conduct of this man and has made its report. Now, what is the defense we have heard to the conclusions of that report? Why that the revenue laws are very complicated; and therefore (I do not understand the logic) he could not help offering bribes. [Laughter.] That is the whole of it.

Why, sir, the very defense, excuse, or apology that has been made for the man ought not merely to call upon him to cry out in very agony, "Save me from my friends," but it ought to induce him to request to be relieved from any sort of excuse that is made for him.

Mr. WOOD. I submit to the gentleman that I did not attempt any defense of the collector of New York.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I withdraw anything I have said in that particular.

Mr. WOOD. I distinctly declared that I did not attempt to defend Mr. Smythe, nor did I profess to be his friend. I did defend him from the charge of having belonged to the Democratic party, [laughter;] but beyond that I think I ventured no defense of his case.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, sir, I differ from the Democratic party perhaps in this: if he be a Democrat let him be tried and exposed; but if he be a Republican by all means let him be tried and exposed. We are not of those who stand up to defend men because they belong to our party; but believe all the more if they are guilty that they should be brought to punishment, because they disgrace their general character as men as well as the character of the party with which they unfortunately happen to be connected, which attempts to stand upon its principles, high above all these things. I do not care, therefore, whether he belongs to the Democratic or Republican party. I do care whether he be or be not a criminal. Everything that has been disclosed in this House points, perhaps unerringly, certainly with some degree of suspicion, to his guilt, and we cannot avoid looking upon him as a man who has been guilty of such high crimes that he ought to be relieved from the place he so unworthily occupies, and from which he is not perhaps likely to be removed unless Congress does intervene for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. Perhaps he will resign.

Mr. HULBURD. The gentleman from Ohio says perhaps he will be continued in. I beg to state that a gentleman told me day before yesterday that he heard Mr. Smythe say distinctly that he had a letter from the President's Private Secretary assuring him that he was all right, or as the expression was, "all hunky-dory," and he should continue on. [Laughter.] I want the House to understand that if we adjourn without doing anything the effect will be to keep this man in.

Mr. WOOD. I ask my colleague whether he believes, after this testimony which he himself has given to the House to-day and after his repeated allegations that Mr. Smythe is not to be believed under any circumstances, that Mr. Smythe made that declaration, and whether he believes, if he made such a declaration, he told the truth?

Mr. HULBURD. I think very likely he did make that declaration.

Mr. WOOD. Do you believe he made it?

Mr. HULBURD. I do.

Mr. WOOD. Do you believe he told the truth when he made it?

Mr. HULBURD. Oh, that is another thing, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. That is the main thing.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have another reason for proposing this investigation. Mr. Smythe, it appears, testified before the committee that he had always voted with the Democratic party, and afterward from some prudential consideration or other he had that portion of his testimony erased. Now, a member from New York rises in his place and says that Mr. Smythe never belonged to the Democratic party. If that is so, he is a perjurer. Now, sir, with such a charge made before this House, that that man was capable of swearing to a falsehood in that particular, have we not good reason to suspect his criminality in other things, and therefore good reason to pursue this investigation? I do not know or inquire where the weight of testimony will be upon that particular proposition if this is to be made in an issue in the inquiry, as perhaps it will not. But if weight is to be given to the statements made on this floor there is certainly a falsehood sworn to.

Sir, I take the gentleman from New York at his word. He charges this man with perjury. Here before this House, in the course of this debate, he charges him with having sworn to a lie.

Mr. WOOD. The chairman of the committee said that he afterward withdrew that statement.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe that when an oath is already registered in Heaven he cannot wipe out the record. The fact is before the House that he swore to a distinct and positive fact, and afterward, for certain reasons known best to himself, he struck out that part of his testimony; but he did not thus change the fact that he had thus sworn, although he struck out the proof as written down in black and white by the stenographer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman intend to make profert of that record which he states is above?

Mr. SCHENCK. If I did, the gentleman would be the last messenger I would send there with any expectation of being able to procure it. [Laughter.]

I do not wish to detain the House further. I desire to move the previous question upon my resolution. I have modified it so as to leave out that part about bringing articles of impeachment, and so that it will read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures of this House be instructed to inquire into the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, in connection with the administration of his said office and in connection with his proceedings as a witness before the Committee on Public Expenditures of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, &c.

Mr. COVODE. I suggest to the gentleman whether he had not better strike out the latter clause of that resolution, which provides that the committee may sit during the recess of Congress. I would ask the gentleman whether the committee have not already sufficient testimony, or whether they cannot obtain enough in five or ten days, without letting this matter run in the summer months?

Mr. SCHENCK. The testimony will expand if we have hot weather. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULBURD. There will be no end to the investigation if the House expects the committee to hear all the testimony that may be offered on both sides. My own ideas, although I speak in the absence of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BROOMALL,] that the committee can dispose of this matter next week, and I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that he amend his resolution so as to authorize the committee to report at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am a very accommodating man, and as I see no objection to that suggestion, I will accede to it, and I modify the resolution accordingly.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to authorize a committee to report at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I trust there will be no objection.

No objection was made.

I now demand the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. ALLISON, (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 39) to provide means for the prosecution of the work on the distributing reservoir of the Washington aqueduct, reported it without amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 34) relative to the holding of courts in the southern district of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TREASURY PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a concurrent resolution; and I ask for immediate action upon it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint Committee on Retrenchment be, and are hereby, instructed to make a careful and minute examination of the method adopted by the Treasury Department to print the bonds, notes, and securities of the United States, what guards have been adopted to prevent fraud or mistake, and what additional guards, if any, ought to be adopted to prevent fraud or mistake; whether there has been any fraudulent or erroneous issue of bonds, notes, or coupons, and if so, by whose fault or negligence, and the proper remedy and prevention thereof; and especially to examine the official conduct of those charged with the printing, registration, and issuing of any notes, bonds, or securities of the United States; and that said committee have power to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, to examine the same, and to take testimony, and report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance thought it was better to make this a formal investigation, with a view to preventing the multitude of investigations proposed by the two Houses. On the motion of my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] the Senate has ordered a committee to be appointed to make such an examination, and a proposition is also pending in the other House to appoint a House committee for the same purpose. We thought it better to refer the whole matter to the joint Committee on Retrenchment, which has already partially examined the subject. It is due to the public, and it is due to the Treasury Department, and it is due to the law-making power that this matter be carefully and thoroughly examined. The Treasury Department, I may say, desire an examination. They have themselves instituted a most rigid and careful examination of the whole matter; and they find no fraud and no real mistakes that are not easily explained. But for the purpose of satisfying the public mind and of satisfying Congress it is deemed proper to institute a careful examination of the whole matter. I have, therefore, made the language as full and broad as possible, and I hope the resolution will be adopted, and that this examination will be entered into rigorously.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if this has not been examined once or twice at every session of Congress since we have had this Printing Bureau? Certainly I can recollect three examinations.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has been by select committees; but we want now to make an examination, if possible, that will end the matter. This resolution provides for a complete and full investigation. It is proposed with the consent of the Treasury Department. They desire an examination, and both Houses seem to desire one. The public mind is excited about it. I see in the newspapers every once in a while paragraphs stating that hundreds of thousands, or sometimes hundreds of millions of bonds are overissued beyond the extent authorized by law. Many of these statements are made for gambling purposes, merely to excite the public mind and affect the market. It is due to the Department to say that on all the careful examinations they have made they have found no cases of fraud, but have found some cases of erroneous numbering of coupons. At any rate to satisfy the public mind it is proper that there should be a fair and full investigation by a joint committee of the two Houses, to report at the next session.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not object to the investigation, but I hope, with the Senator from Ohio, that it will be full and complete. It seems to me there ought to be some time or other when a public officer, after having gone through examination after examination, shall be presumed to have done his duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Both Houses seem to desire to make an examination in this case. The Senate the other day, by a unanimous vote, ordered a special committee for this very purpose, and the other House are proposing to do the same thing. Now, we propose a formal and careful examination by a joint committee, with power to send for persons and papers and take depositions and examine fully.

Mr. GRIMES. I think such an examination as this ought to be made annually. I think, no matter how many examinations have been made in the past, the rule that is proposed by the Senator from Ohio that the Committee on Retrenchment, which we have made a standing committee of the two Houses, shall annually examine into all the transactions of this Printing Bureau, is very proper. It is the most important bureau in connection with the Government, and it cannot be too carefully guarded or too closely watched.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ABATEMENT OF DUTIES ON DAMAGED GOODS.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report a bill, which it is deemed important by the Treasury Department should be promptly acted on, and I therefore ask that it be considered now.

The bill (S. No. 76) providing for the abatement of duties on merchandise damaged on the voyage of importation was read the first time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce what the difficulty with the law now is, and what this bill proposes to do?

Mr. CHANDLER. I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which explains it. There has been a decision of the Supreme Court, in consequence of which this legislation is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I decide whether I object or not I want to know what is proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter sent to the desk by the Senator from Michigan will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 14, 1867.

SIR: It has been recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Shelton et al. vs. Arthur W. Austin, late collector of customs at Boston, that the twenty-first section of the act of 1st March, 1823, in connection with the proviso of the second section of the act of 3d March, 1857, prohibits the allowance of a reduction of duties on account of damage occurring on the voyage of importation, unless it is claimed before the goods are entered, and unless the entry is made by appraisement and not upon invoices.

The practice has been hitherto, in accordance with the fifty-second section of the act of 2d March, 1799, to admit of allowance for damage when proof thereof has been lodged in the custom-house within ten days after the landing of the merchandise in question, even though it may have been first completely entered.

In conforming the practice of this Department to the law as thus established much embarrassment will be experienced both by the Department and by the importers.

I therefore beg to submit herewith, in the form of a bill, such provisions relating to the subject of damage as commend themselves to the judgment of the Department.

These sections form a part of the revenue code already submitted to Congress, but are brought to your notice thus, in a different form, because of the necessity that has arisen to settle the policy to be pursued in the future.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. J. CHANDLER, Chairman Committee on Commerce, Senate.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I apprehend that bill changes the existing law materially, and I ask that the bill may be printed and postponed until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made to the present consideration of the bill, it lies over under the rule. It will be printed, as a matter of course.

COURTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes, to report it back with sundry amendments, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration. It is necessary for the prosecution of justice in that new State that the bill should pass at this session, and I presume there will be no objection whatever to it.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are various amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, and perhaps it will facilitate matters to have the bill read as it will stand if amended. No objection being made, that course will be pursued.

The Secretary read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Nebraska shall hereafter constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Nebraska; and for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said district of Nebraska shall be attached to and constitute a part of the eighth judicial circuit; and a term of the circuit court and district court of the United States for said district shall be held in the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, on the first Monday of May and on the first Monday of November in each year.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and the judges thereof respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties possessed and performed by other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the district judge appointed for the district of Nebraska shall receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 a year, payable in four equal installments, on the first days of January, April, July, and October of each year.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the marshal and district attorney of the United States for the said district of Nebraska shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall for the services they perform receive the fees and compensation allowed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted, and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Nebraska may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, or to the supreme court of the State of Nebraska, as the nature of said appeal or writ of error may require; and each of these courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Nebraska Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process thereon. And from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Nebraska, prior to its admission as a State, the parties to said judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Federal courts as they had under the laws of the United States prior to the admission of said State of Nebraska into the Union.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, until a judge for said district shall be duly appointed, the district judge of the United States for the district of Iowa shall act as the district judge for Nebraska, and shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers in the district hereby created as he has in the district of Iowa.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the first section which now reads "and for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney shall be appointed," by adding: "by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." I suppose that will be the construction of it; but perhaps it is better to say so.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

OREGON AND WASHINGTON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back with an amendment, accompanied by a very brief written report. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the joint resolution and pass it now. It will occasion no discussion. It is merely to give a construction to an existing act of Congress.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to construe the second section of the act of March 2, 1861, entitled "An act to provide for the payment of expenses incurred by the Territories of Washington and Oregon in the suppression of Indian hostilities therein in the years 1855 and 1856," so that whenever any claimant for property lost shall comply with all the terms and conditions of the act of March 3, 1849, on the subject of property lost in the military service, he shall be paid the amount of the award which was made by the commissioners who audited such claims, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was to strike out "award in his, her, or their favor which was made by the commissioners who audited such claims," and in lieu thereof to insert "judgments in his, her, or their favor entered by the Third Auditor, and certified by him, as required by the last named act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in. The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CAPTURED COIN AND BULLION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 10) in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury. The Finance Committee have taken no action on it, as it is a resolution that was considered by the joint Committee on Retrenchment, and by the instruction of that committee was reported to the other House. After being passed there it was brought to the Senate and inadvertently sent to the Committee on Finance. I ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration, as it is important that action should be had on it at this time. I find that it is necessary that I should propose an amendment, which will make it necessary to send the resolution back to the House of Representatives.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the one hundred thousand dollars, or thereabout, in coin and bullion, now on special deposit in the Treasury of the United States, be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a report of the Committee on Retrenchment accompanying this resolution. Certain banks in the State of Virginia claim $100,000 now on special deposit in the Treasury of the United States, and the President has made an order that the money be paid to those banks on their complying with certain terms and conditions. The subject was referred to the joint Committee on Retrenchment, who have considered it and examined all the evidence bearing upon the question, and it is the opinion of that committee that this money should be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and that if those banks have any claims to it they should prosecute their claims before the Court of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON. Can they do that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This resolution does not now give the Court of Claims jurisdiction; but as reported from the committee it did provide that anybody claiming the money might prosecute a claim to it before that court; but that portion of the joint resolution was stricken out in the House of Representatives, so that as it now stands it simply provides that this money shall be paid into the Treasury. I suppose under the general law if these banks have a claim against the United States for $100,000 in money, and the United States is holding that amount of money belonging to them, they can prosecute the United States before the Court of Claims.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would ask the Senator if this is the money that was captured with Jefferson Davis.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is the money that was captured about that time. It was understood to be the money with that party.

Mr. HENDERSON. According to my recollection of the terms of the law defining the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, if it is the purpose of the committee to open the door for the prosecution of suits for the recovery of the money it will have to be done expressly by this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is my impression. I hope at any rate it will be postponed. I desire to look into it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend the resolution by inserting after "United States" in line five the words "after said bullion is converted under the authority of the Treasurer into coin."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that question is put, I desire to say a word. It is important, not only for the government of the President, but for the government of the Treasurer, that this question should be settled. This money was placed as a special deposit in the Treasury of the United States. In my opinion the President has no right to order the money out of the Treasury; and if I were Treasurer I would not pay out the money on his order, because money can only be drawn from the Treasury in pursuance of law. General Spinner is a very accurate and exact man, and I do not believe he will pay the money on the order of anybody, unless it comes in the regular form by draft from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. Such things have been done.

Mr. SHERMAN. They cannot be without a violation of law in my judgment. I never heard of it. It ought not to be done. This controversy is in a nutshell. The banks of Virginia loaned $300,000 of gold to the confederate government. The banks now deny that they loaned it, but claim that it was taken from them. At any rate, it is insisted now that this gold belongs to the banks, was their private property, and that if so it was restored to them at the time of the surrender, no private property being taken by the General Government under the surrender. If this gold belonged to the confederate government, so called, it falls by the rights of war into the rightful custody of the United States; it falls to the United States, and it ought to go to the Treasury of the United States, and the President has no power over its disposition.

That is the controversy. The House of Representatives, however, has undertaken to decide the controversy against the banks. The President undertook to decide it in favor of the banks. It seems to me that neither is right. The money ought to remain as it is, on deposit in the Treasury, and these banks ought to be authorized to commence a suit in the Court of Claims to establish their right. By the statements made by the Committee on Retrenchment—I have read the report—I have no doubt that it was the property of the confederate States, and is, therefore, now rightfully the property of the United States, but possibly that report may only contain the statement of one side of the question. If that report contains all the facts of the case I should decide in favor of the United States; but it seems to me the question ought to be settled by some competent tribunal. The Court of Claims is the proper one in such case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind Senators that on a motion to postpone, the merits of the bill are hardly a proper subject of discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that on a motion to postpone until to-morrow it is right to consider what the merit is, because the postponement until to-morrow may be a defeat of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there be objection the Chair will not interpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish merely to say that the Senator from Ohio is mistaken in supposing that the House of Representatives has undertaken to decide this case against the banks. It has simply provided, as I understand, that this money shall go into the Treasury. Then any claimant of money that is in the Treasury, like any other claimant against the Government, of course will prosecute his claim in the Court of Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. The jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is confined to certain specified cases, and it is clear that this would not fall within its general jurisdiction under the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator is mistaken about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then there can be no objection to putting in a clause giving jurisdiction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Court of Claims has jurisdiction. There can be no objection, however, to putting in such a provision; but the mere fact that Congress provides that this money shall be paid into the Treasury, and shall go into the general account instead of the special account, is no decision against the claim, because whoever has a legal right to it can get it out just as easy by process of law one way as the other, and it cannot be got out, as the Senator from Ohio has rightly said, without some process of law. The President, in my opinion, has no more right to take it out than I have or anybody else.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this matter will not be postponed, because it is absolutely necessary that some decision should be made upon this subject before the adjournment of the present session; and as this joint resolution is to be amended, and will, therefore, necessarily have to go back to the House, I hope its consideration will not be postponed.

Mr. JOHNSON. The only reason I have for wishing the postponement is that I may become satisfied and the Senate may become satisfied that the Court of Claims has jurisdiction over the subject; for unless the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of the subject the banks cannot get the money out of the Treasury in case this resolution passes. As to the authority of the President to restore money placed on deposit under the circumstances under which, as I understand, this money has been placed, there may be differences of opinion. I recollect one case that occurred during the war, when there were some forty or fifty thousand dollars taken by the Government of an establishment in this city, they claiming that it was the receipt of a gambling transaction between the proprietor of a gambling-house and an officer of the Government. It was received upon special deposit in the Treasury, and afterward, upon their being satisfied that the money really did belong to the parties who claimed it and had not been received as the fruits of a gambling transaction, it was paid out by the Register without the consent of the President. The interpretation, as I understood at that time—I am not sure that it was right, and it is a dangerous practice if the interpretation be right—was that when the Government receive money upon deposit they are bound to deal with it just as any individual would be bound to deal with money placed in his hands on special deposit; it does not go into the Treasury, was not intended to go into the Treasury, from the very nature of the transaction; and not going into the Treasury, the Government holds it as anybody else would hold it under such circumstances.

As I have said, there is some danger in recognizing that principle now as a sound one, because there may be a great deal of money in the Treasury which may be considered as there in the nature of a deposit, and over that the President or the Secretary should not have, in my judgment, any absolute control. I am, therefore, in favor of the resolution, provided it be true that after the resolution shall be adopted, and the money shall go in the Treasury generally as the ordinary funds of the Government, there be a means left by which the owner, if the United States be not the owner, may recover it back by some legal proceeding. I forget the terms of the last acts in relation to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, but my present recollection is that they are not sufficiently comprehensive to cover a case of this description. All I want is to be satisfied that they are. There certainly can be no error in making that point clear. I understood the honorable member from Oregon to say that jurisdiction was expressly given to that court by the resolution, originally reported, and that that provision in the resolution was stricken out by the House. I presume from that it must have been because they did not desire that the matter should be submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think, on looking at the act establishing the Court of Claims and the acts amendatory thereof, it is extremely doubtful, now that I have them under my eye, whether the Court of Claims could entertain the jurisdiction of this claim without special authority. The jurisdiction seems to be confined to some special contract, express or implied, with the Government. This upon strictly technical common law principles might be an implied contract to repay money that the Government had no right to; but it would be doubtful whether the court would so construe it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask whether the court would not construe this very act of Congress as a decision by Congress on the subject? Would the court not regard it as a decision by Congress that the money belonged properly to the Treasury, and therefore ought not to be paid out?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think they would do so; but I entirely agree to the propriety of providing in this very resolution that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to determine the question. That will avoid all doubt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 83.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope we shall be allowed to dispose of this joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not object if a vote can be had on the resolution; but if there is to be any further debate I must insist upon going on with the unfinished business.

Several SENATORS. There will be no debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid aside if there be no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not for any length of time. If the Senate is ready to vote on this resolution I make no objection to going on with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The special order will be laid aside informally. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] to House joint resolution No. 10.

Mr. CORBETT. Do I understand this amendment to give the right to prosecute this claim before the Court of Claims, or was that stricken out by the House, and is the question on the House amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is to insert after the words "United States" in the fifth line the words "after said bullion is converted by direction of the Treasurer into coin."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the resolution by adding to it a provision that the parties in interest shall have leave to prosecute their claim in the Court of Claims, or any words that will effect that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have drawn an amendment which will perhaps cover it:

And any party claiming said money and bullion may file a petition to be allowed and paid the same in the Court of Claims; and said court upon proceedings as in other cases shall hear and determine such petition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the word "parties" would include a corporation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. A corporation is a party claimant.

Mr. CORBETT. Before this amendment is adopted, I should like to know a little further about this money. As I understand, this money was captured at the same time that Jefferson Davis was captured, before the surrender or about that time. I think it was captured as rebel property like any other property belonging to the confederate States. If so, I should oppose the amendment giving the claimants the right to prosecute their claim before the Court of Claims. It seems to me that it was captured like any other property belonging to the confederate service, and is therefore properly the property of the Government of the United States. I shall vote against the amendment unless I can hear explanations that convince me to the contrary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a question as to whether this was the property of the banks or the property of the confederate government. The banks claim that it was their private property. It is claimed on behalf of the Government that it belonged to the confederate government. That is one question in the case. It is not strictly property that was captured at the time Jefferson Davis was captured; but it was property that was deposited in the southern banks by officers of the confederate government, and was therefore claimed by the Government of the United States as property which had belonged to the confederate government, and which on that account became the property of the United States upon the dissolution of that government.

Mr. CORBETT. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think my friend from Oregon exactly understands the nature of the controversy between the Government and the banks. The money, as I understand, was captured at the time when Davis was captured. Whether it belonged to the confederate government will depend upon the manner in which that government got possession of the coin. If it was loaned to them by the banks, then the United States are entitled to hold it as captured property. If, on the contrary, it was taken by force from the banks by the confederate government, it belongs to the banks, unless we are willing to sanction the act of the confederate government in depriving the banks of their property. The whole effect of this amendment is to enable the banks to have that question tried. If it shall turn out that they had loaned the money, then it belongs to the United States. If it shall turn out that instead of loaning the money it was taken from them by force, then of course the United States would have no title, and they ought to be very willing to refund it. It would be more especially just if that should turn out to be the fact, because there are a great many widows and orphans depending more or less upon the stock which they hold in these banks; and if this money is taken from them the whole of their property may be swept from them. If it be the property of the banks and not the property of the Government, I think my friend will agree that it should be at once returned to the banks. All that this amendment does is to provide a judicial mode by which that question shall be tried. I am sure there is no reason to doubt that the judgment of the Court of Claims will be such as the law and the facts will justify. The judges of that court hold their offices by a law which may be repealed at any time by the Congress of the United States. Beside that, they are men of high character, eminent lawyers, all of them, and there can be no reason to doubt that they will decide the question fairly.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to know what is the specific question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to know what that amendment is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read again.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add to the resolution:

And any parties claiming said money and bullion, or any part thereof, may file a petition to be allowed and paid the same in the Court of Claims; and said court, upon proceeding as in other cases, shall hear and determine such petition.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senate had better not agree to that amendment. The Court of Claims was organized for the purpose of trying questions of contract, or questions arising on contracts, to which the Government was a party; and I do not now remember that their jurisdiction has been extended beyond that. The question raised here is a question of title as to a specific sum of money, and the question is or may be one of great importance, and it seems to me it is a question which may more properly be determined by the Congress of the United States than by any tribunal it has yet created. I agree to the resolution. I think the money ought to be paid into the Treasury, and to be subject to the disposition of the Government, as other sums in the Treasury are; and if any one man can show a better title to this money than the Government can, let him come to Congress and establish that title. I do not see why this is not as fair a tribunal as the Court of Claims, and as fair even to the claimants. I think it is a question that had better be determined here than elsewhere.

Mr. CORBETT. I know that in prosecuting a claim of this kind for $100,000 there is great facility employed in many cases to bring up evidence that would be satisfactory perhaps to many people, but that might not be satisfactory to Congress. I believe that this is the proper place to prosecute such a claim and the place to present the evidence with regard to this amount of money. I believe it is generally conceded and thought by the people of the United States that Jefferson Davis is a subject under the United States authorities as well as this money, that he has not been disposed of as yet; but he is held in custody, and I believe that this money should be held as belonging to the United States. I believe that it was captured as property belonging to the rebel government. Whether it was originally taken from the banks by force or whether it was loaned by them is a matter of no difference. The banks, as I understand, gave their support to the rebel government; they extended every facility in their power to perpetuate that government and to strengthen it in every way that they could do. Whether this money was taken from the banks or not is a matter of no difference; it was in the hands of the rebel government at the time that it was captured; is to be treated the same as any other property that was used for thwarting this Government, for thwarting its authority, and for maintaining the opposition to the United States Government and defeating its authority. Therefore I shall oppose this amendment. It opens the door for presenting many other claims; it opens the door to claims for all kinds of captured property that was taken from the rebel government; and if we consent to the prosecution of this claim before the Court of Claims we shall have claims without end. I shall oppose the allowing of the prosecution of any claim for property that was captured by our Army from that rebel government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish simply to correct a statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] as to the fact that there were no precedents for this amendment. I do not care whether the amendment is adopted or not; I should prefer not to have it adopted, as the House struck out of the resolution as it was reported from the committee that part which conferred jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims; but the act of March 12, 1863, provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should perform certain duties in regard to captured property, and declared:

"And any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims; and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion, to receive the residue of such proceeds, after the deduction of any purchase money which may have been paid, together with the expense of transportation and sale of said property, and any other lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof."

This act confers upon claimants the right to prosecute in the Court of Claims for the recovery of moneys that have been realized from the sale of captured and abandoned property; so that that does extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; but it appears to me that there is no particular necessity for the adoption of this amendment. This claim, if it be a good one, can be preferred to Congress at any time, and if desirable provision can be made that the Court of Claims shall take jurisdiction of it.

Mr. HOWE. I did not undertake to say that there was not precedent for this. My attention was called to this subject under debate only a moment before I took the floor, and I did not at the time recollect any precedent for the proposition pending before the Senate. I do now recollect very well the act which the Senator from Oregon refers to. It may, to a certain extent, be a precedent for this; but I think we had better not follow the precedent. I think this amendment had better not be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As my friend from Oregon, who has charge of this matter, thinks, on investigation, it is best to leave the resolution without this amendment, and as the amendment is not, perhaps, as full as it ought to be respecting loyalty, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. NYE. I am in favor of the amendment for this reason: I had a talk with the Treasurer this morning, and he says this deposit is in such a shape, a portion of it bullion, a portion melted coin, and a portion of it alloy, that it is impossible to determine what the amount is in any other way than by sending it to the Mint and having it coined, so that the amount can be ascertained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That amendment has been adopted.

Mr. NYE. Then I think in relation to the other question we had better settle it ourselves. I merely wanted to make the statement that I understood from the Treasurer it was impossible to ascertain the amount of it until it was coined.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have no knowledge of the character of this transaction. When the subject was called up this morning I did not know the money was in the Treasury; but since the resolution has been before the Senate I am told that in fact the money was not captured when Davis was captured, never was in his hands, that it had been sent by the banks for safe-keeping from Richmond to the banks in Georgia, and it was in the Georgia banks at the time it was taken by our officer then in command, General Steadman. There was no pretense, therefore, for saying that it was confederate property, looking to those two facts alone. What I desire is merely that we should put the parties who may be entitled to it in a situation to recover the amount. The honorable member from Oregon supposes that it can be done under the law as it now stands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir, I suppose not; because this law only provides that the suit may be brought within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, and then the persons who are allowed to bring suit under the act must be persons whose loyalty can be established; and there is no question, so far as the facts in this case are concerned, that these banks furnished $300,000 for the confederate government.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not this money?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the question. I am satisfied it was this money, but they claim that it was not this money, and the difficulty arises from the fact that Captain Strother, who had charge of the funds of the confederate government, when he made his escape from Richmond at the time it was surrendered to General Grant, took charge of the funds belonging to the banks and deposited all the funds, certain private funds belonging to the banks and certain funds belonging to the confederate government, in a certain bank in Georgia; and then the parties obtained a permit to bring their money back and they undertook to bring it all back, that which had belonged to the confederate government and their own funds. But certain robbers arrested them on the way and stole a part of the money; but when those robbers found out that it was money that belonged to the United States, having once belonged to the confederate government, they kindly returned the money to those bank officers, and the banks claim that the money which was taken by the robbers was this confederate money.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member tells me, and no doubt he is correct in his reading of the law, that no one can prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims who is disloyal. I do not know in what way it can be ascertained that a corporation is disloyal. I cannot imagine how a corporation can be indicted for disloyalty, tried for treason; and it may be that although it was managed by directors who were disloyal, nine tenths of the stockholders may have been loyal; and to prohibit, if that is the understanding of the honorable member, a bank from prosecuting in the name of the bank the money on the ground that some of the managers of the bank were disloyal would be to punish those whom we are bound to protect. That I am sure is not the wish of the honorable member.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no wish about it. I am simply giving you what the construction of the law is.

Mr. JOHNSON. If, therefore, that is the only difficulty, that is to say, the supposed disloyalty of claimants, I submit, with all proper respect, that that would not embrace this case; nor do I think that it would cover the case as it is supposed to be by the honorable member from Wisconsin. He says that this is not a case of contract, as he understands it, and that we never have given to that court jurisdiction in any other cases than cases arising upon contract. I had supposed that where money was taken improperly by one man from another, the owner might waive the tort and sue the party taking it on a contract implied by the law; and there is no distinction in the law establishing the Court of Claims, if I understand it, between an implied and an expressed contract. In voting for the resolution without the amendment I shall, therefore, act upon the hypothesis that the banks can sue in the Court of Claims and make out their title, if they can.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the resolution read a third time. The resolution was read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now call for the order of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration; the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the fourth section of the committee's amendment by striking out in the eighth, ninth, and tenth lines the words "declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary," and to insert "approved by Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that an amendment has already been adopted at that point.

Mr. HOWE. I do not mean to interfere with the amendment that was adopted. I forget where that comes in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. After the word "supplementary."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be read as amended in that particular.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It contains the words, "approved by Congress" now.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the whole section be read as it stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session then immediately upon its next assembling; and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

Mr. HOWE. I withdraw the amendment. I was not aware that those words were inserted. I now move to amend that section by striking out the word "representation" in the eleventh line, and inserting in lieu thereof "all the prerogatives of a State;" so that the clause will read:

The State shall be declared entitled to all the prerogatives of a State, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

I will simply say that by the law which we have recently enacted those communities are not merely deprived of the right of representation in the Federal Legislature, but they are denied the right of home government, local government. The section as it stands proposes in terms to restore to them, when these things shall have transpired, the right of representation; but does not, in terms, propose to restore them the whole prerogatives, the local prerogatives of States? I suppose the committee intended that that should follow, and I think it better to say so, so that we remove all disabilities and all restrictions, that when this thing is done then they become States in law and in fact.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will look at the whole frame of the bill he will see that it provides not only for the formation of a constitution, but also a civil government for the State. If this constitution and civil government is approved by Congress, it is the constitution of the State, and as a matter of course it has the rights of a State. I think it is all embraced in the bill as it is. I do not think it would change the legal effect of it at all to insert the words which the Senator suggests. Probably, if we were considering this in committee I should not make any special objection to the Senator's suggestion; but I think the substance of it is in the bill; and unless there is something to be gained by it I suggest to my friend from Wisconsin we had better leave it as it is, as by adopting amendments we run into the hazard of making the bill incongruous. I do not to say that this particular amendment would make it incongruous; but the legal effect of the bill is precisely what the Senator states. I do not think there is any importance in the amendment, and therefore I suggest that it is hardly worth while to make it.

Mr. HOWE. If there is any incongruity between the provision which I propose to introduce and any other part of the bill, and the Senator from Illinois will point it out to me, I will endeavor to avoid it; or if the Senator can point me to any provision in the bill which now does in terms restore this right of local government to those communities, or proposes to restore it to them upon the happening of these events, I shall agree with him that this is not at all necessary. I was quite confident that this proposed nothing which the committee did not intend should follow upon the happening of these events, and I thought it was better to make the specific declaration that these consequences should follow, that the State should not only be entitled to the right of representation, but should be entitled to this other right, the right of local government, which we took away from it by the recent act of Congress. For the purpose of being explicit I would rather see the amendment adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. While in one view of the case it might be well to adopt this amendment, in another view, which will perhaps suggest itself to the mind of the Senator, it may not be proper to do so. It declares that the State shall be entitled to representation and to all the prerogatives of a State. In my view of the case, the United States having conquered this territory, we have powers over the territory perhaps that we did not have before. Now, suppose that sufficient guarantees may not be obtained upon the admission of these States by constitutional amendment operating upon all the States; then it may be desirable, when we come to admit these States, to take some guarantee by the way of compact. Possibly the rights of the conqueror may confer upon us the right to make a compact with these States binding upon the States. I am not disposed to say that such a thing could not be done. As I have already said, we may fail to get such guarantees as we need. But I do not wish to declare that when those States are admitted upon compliance simply with what we have done here they shall be entitled to all the prerogatives of any other State. That will be certainly the meaning of this proposition. I can imagine several reasons why this should not be adopted, or rather I can imagine several states of case in which it might be desirable to take guarantees that we have not here; and if we are to admit them, or if we are to obligate ourselves to admit them, we deny ourselves in honor the privilege then to take these further guarantees. Therefore, perhaps it would be well not to adopt an amendment of this sort. I merely throw out the suggestion.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Missouri apprehends such a contingency as he has just suggested, it seems to me we should change the bill as it stands; we should refrain from promising them the right of representation. I cannot conceive that any one of these communities can come before us under the recent law and this addition to it in an attitude which would entitle them to the right of representation here, and would not entitle them to the right of exerting the home control which belongs to a State. When they entitle themselves to one of these prerogatives, they entitle themselves to the other. I conceive that there can be no state of case in which we ought to deprive them of one without depriving them of the other, and there can be no conceivable state of case in which we would be authorized to concede them the one without conceding them the other; and inasmuch as the bill now before us, or the amendment now before us, proposes to promise them one of these prerogatives, the right of representation here, I wish to have it promise them the other, that they might understand distinctly that the whole character of a State was to be restored to them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The objection that occurs to me in reference to the amendment is that there is an implication that they have not now the prerogatives of a State. Some of the prerogatives of a State they may retain now. It may be important to treat them as retaining judicial powers, the power of being liable for their debts, of its being the identical State which contracted the debt. Therefore, I think it is better to avoid those questions than by implication throw out the idea that they have not those functions of a State.

Mr. HOWARD. In order to avoid all doubt and ambiguity on the subject, suppose we let it stand as we placed it when we passed the reconstruction bill of last session. If it be in order, I move to strike out all of this section after the word "assembling" in the eighth line as being useless, and worse than useless. It is tending to unnecessary and perhaps in the future pernicious complications.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to an amendment is now pending, and the amendment suggested by the Senator is not now in order. It will be in order when this is disposed of. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWARD. That is, to strike out the word "representation."

Mr. HOWE. And insert "all the prerogatives of a State."

Mr. HOWARD. I am opposed to that amendment. The proposition which we have made to the rebel States is a very plain one. It is that after they have complied with certain conditions—precedent—

"Said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding section of this bill shall be inoperative in said States."

There is the limit which Congress has already fixed and established: that on these States complying with certain conditions, plainly expressed and perfectly intelligible to all, they shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on taking the oath prescribed by law; that is, the so-called test oath of 1862. Now, sir, I am for carrying out this proposition equitably and strictly according to its terms and intent; and I am opposed to any alteration of it at this time. I do not believe in enacting a law one day and the next day changing it, or making a proposition one day and retracting it or modifying it the next. I do not therefore see any necessity for this portion of the section, and I shall move to strike it out at the proper time.

While I am up I beg to say further that this section is defective in providing that—

If the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

There seems to be perhaps, not an intentional omission, but an omission to repeat the requirement contained in the former acts, that persons presenting themselves for admission as Representatives or Senators shall take the test oath of 1862. That is a condition upon which I am strongly disposed to insist at all times. At any rate, I do not see the propriety of the present amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise for the purpose of inquiring of the Senator from Wisconsin what the distinction is that he makes for this purpose between saying that States may then be entitled to representation and saying that they shall have all the prerogatives of States? I see, of course, there is a distinction for other purposes, but for this purpose I do not see it. If the Senator will be kind enough to indicate what he means, for one I can vote more intelligibly than I can now.

Mr. HOWE. I will state to the honorable Senator from New York what I understand to be the distinction. I understand an American State under our Constitution to be entitled to two great prerogatives, to say no more. One is the right to a certain amount of representation in the tribunal which makes laws for the nation and which chooses Presidents and Vice Presidents for the nation; and the other is the right to make all other laws and to institute a home government for the exercise of all powers which do not belong to the Government of the United States. I understand by the recent enactment of Congress both these prerogatives have been taken from those communities. Previous to that act they had been denied one of those prerogatives, that is the right to representation in Congress and the right to representation in the Electoral Colleges. The other prerogative, the right to maintain those local governments and wield those home powers, they enjoyed in a qualified sort of way so far as the President would allow them to enjoy them, but without any inhibition on the part of Congress; but by that act they were deprived of both; the local governments were declared to be not the governments of States, but provisional governments, and were subjected to the Federal authority, and the right of representation was denied to them in terms altogether. Now, by this act it is proposed that upon the happening of certain events, in terms, the right of representation shall be given, and I wish that the other right, the right to maintain these local governments independent of Federal control, or any other Federal control than we exercise in New York, Massachusetts, or Wisconsin, should go at the same time.

Mr. CONKLING. If I could concede the occasion for anything more definite than we have in the bill already for this purpose, and if I could be sure that the phrase chosen by the Senator is adapted to that purpose and to no other, I should be with him entirely as to this amendment. But, in the first place, I doubt a little the signification of this expression, "all the prerogatives of a State." Without stopping to discuss that, however, it seems to me very clear that the bill as it will stand in connection with the acts already passed puts beyond a question the doubt which the Senator suggests. Certainly I think no one can suppose that after forming a constitution of government republican in its character, devising all the machinery of State government for every purpose, submitting the constitution ordaining it to the people, and having it ratified and accepted by Congress, and being permitted to resume the practical relations of a State with the Federal Government—nobody, I think, in the face of such a succession of provisions as this, could doubt for one moment that the full measure of a State for every purpose inside and out was left with these communities and conferred upon them as far as we have any power for that purpose. I have no partiality, for one, to the expression as it stands, except that in several bills and in the constitutional amendment this very phrase has been used; and it seems to me that the sameness and identity of it in all these cases recommends it.

Mr. JOHNSON, (to Mr. CONKLING.) Read the provision on page 6, commencing in the fifth line of the second section.

Mr. CONKLING. I refer, as the Senator from Maryland reminds me, in what I have said to this, among the other provisions of the bill, and covering this point:

"An election shall be held of delegates to a convention for the purpose of establishing a constitution and civil government for such State loyal to the Union; said convention in each State, except Virginia, to consist," &c.

That is the very thing, that is the gravamen of this bill; and I cannot suppose that it is necessary to enlarge its subsequent phrases in order to define the very essence of the measure.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him this question: does he not suppose that the civil government spoken of in that section, and which that convention is to institute, is actually the selection of a Governor and Legislature and judges?

Mr. CONKLING. Not actually the selection, but actually the foundation and provision in the most radical and capacious sense for the selection of a Governor and judges and everything else which pertains to State machinery or State function.

Mr. HOWE. Providing a charter which shall regulate the action of these tribunals when they are selected. The Senator knows very well that those communities have just such charters down there to-day, and have just such officers, Governors, Legislatures, and courts; and yet the Senator knows that by the recent act of Congress they have been denied the exercise, and are to-day denied the exercise, of the authority conferred upon them by those local charters.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, Mr. President, and I propose, in order to make the argument for this proposition as strong as it can possibly be, to assume that there is a total obliteration of all civil governments in these States; that the germ of civil government lives nowhere except as it resides in the people. That is as strong as you can put it. That is stronger than it is in the case of a Territory, if you please; and yet, if my memory serves me, this is the language we use in admitting a new State. The Senator shakes his head. He means to say that this is not the language used in an enabling act.

Mr. HOWE. I think it is not. We admit them, then, in terms on equality with the other States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On an equal footing.

Mr. HOWE. And that is the language employed in the Constitution.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentlemen are altogether on a different point. I say the language which we have used in the second section of the bill, in providing what they may do in organizing governments and providing themselves with it, is the language, or the equivalent of the language, used in the enabling acts applicable to Territories. I am aware that we say upon another point that when they become States they become so upon an equality with all the other States. If Senators are prepared to embrace the theory that the Statehood of these communities is extinct, that they are in no sense States, either in the Union or out of it, then I can see it might be necessary to add something which, in addition to providing them State governments and giving them representation and giving them power of government within themselves, should gazette the nations of the world with the fact that we now admit that they have become States. But this bill was drawn, as these other bills have been, I think fortunately, to avoid the theories, one way or the other, upon which the country and parties are divided in that regard. It seems to me very clear that the bill is sufficient as it is; but I have no choice of phrases.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill to take the place of the oath which is contained on page 6. Before sending it to the Chair, I beg to explain the nature of it. The oath as inserted in the substitute under consideration is as follows:

I, —, of —, in the county or parish of —, in the State of —, do hereby solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am not excluded from the right to vote by the fifth and sixth sections of said act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States; that I will support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and that I will, to the best of my ability, encourage all others to do the same: so help me God.

And it is provided that this "oath or affirmation may be administered by any registering officer." Now, sir, the substance of the oath is here to be understood by reference to the statute which we passed at the last session; and the party taking the oath is required by this bill to swear that he is not excluded by the terms of the former act; but he is not required to swear affirmatively what his qualifications are according to that act. This is a blind mode of putting an oath to an affiant or a deponent; and if this form of oath is suffered to remain in the bill, if we shall pass it, it will turn out, I fear, in the end that thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of persons who are not in reality and in fact qualified as voters under the act which we have passed, will come forward and blindly and heedlessly take this oath without reference to the requirement of the act itself. Now, I propose, on the other hand, to state in the oath itself what the qualifications are, so as to bring these qualifications clearly and immediately to the mind and memory of the voter when he offers himself for registration. The form of oath which I suggest embraces all the requirements contained in the former act. I do not think there can be any objection to it. I will read it:

I, —, do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of —.

It will be observed that this oath is to be signed by the deponent, the voter, and filed in some safe depository by the military commandant who receives it:

I, _____, do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of _____; that I have resided in said State for _____ months next preceding this day, and now reside in the county of _____, or the parish of _____, in said State, (as the case may be); that I am twenty-one years old; that I have not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States, nor for felony committed against the laws of any State or of the United States; that I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I am sincerely and earnestly attached to the Government of the United States and the Union of the States under the same; that I will faithfully support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, encourage others so to do: so help me God.

Then I propose to add after the word "officer" in the twenty-second line the following clause:

And every person taking such oath, and in so doing swearing falsely, shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction be punished as provided by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The amendment will be reported.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator has just read it at length, and I do not know that it is necessary, unless some Senator wishes it, to have it read again. I trust the Senate will not adopt that long oath. The oath provided for in the bill is substantially that oath, leaving out that part of it which requires the voter to swear to his sincerity. There is no such thing as that in the oath in the bill. The Senator proposes that the voter shall swear that he is sincere. I would not give much for that kind of an oath. I do not think it is worth any thing.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; I think that is not contained in my amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the Clerk read it.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the Senator has misapprehended it.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that it is necessary to incorporate all the laws of the land into this bill. It will be observed that the Senator has in this form of oath, as he provides it, a requirement that the voter shall swear that he is sincerely and earnestly attached to the Union. Now, what does that amount to? It makes oaths very cheap to require that kind of an oath of a person, to swear as to his sincerity. I will not take up time upon that.

Again, the Senator from Michigan proposes to punish for perjury a person who swears falsely. How are you going to prove that the man is not sincere? How are you going to prove that he is not in earnest? Are you going to put him in the penitentiary if you can prove that he was not sincere when he swears that he was sincere? The statutes now provide that when a person swears falsely, no matter where an oath is required to be administered, he is guilty of perjury. Do you wish to repeal that statute?

Again, the Senator, instead of adopting the form of the oath as it is prescribed here, that the voter is not excluded from the right to vote by the fifth and sixth sections of an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, adopts the oath that is therein referred to, and repeats it here; and he uses in his oath the word "disfranchised." He makes the voter swear that he is not disfranchised by any law of the United States. Why did he not put in all the disfranchising clauses, copy the whole of them, and make the voter swear to the whole of them?

Now, sir, I take it that the persons who make this registration of voters will explain to the persons who take the oath the meaning of these words. They will have before them, doubtless, the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and they will know what class of persons are excluded, and will explain to any one who wishes to understand it what is meant by requiring him to swear that he is not excluded by those sections. I do not think it necessary to copy those sections into the oath. I trust that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. I am not particular as to the retention of the phrase "sincerely attached to the Government of the United States." I do not regard it as very important. Still I look upon it as of some value. We are about to call before the board of registration in the various rebel States a multitude of men who know nothing whatever about the laws of the United States, men who can neither read nor write, by thousands and tens of thousands; and men who, though they may be able to read and write, care little for your oaths, and who are just as willing to go it blind now as they were four or five years ago. The Senator from Illinois seems to be entirely willing to bridge over the passage between rebelism and Unionism by suggesting to the voter that if he will swear that he is not excluded from the right of voting by a statute of the United States, of which he knows nothing, he may do so. Sir, I am opposed to this blind way of administering oaths and getting testimony. Why not, in so many words, when the voter presents himself before the board of registration, tell him what the qualifications which he must possess are before he is allowed to register his name?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why does not the Senator from Michigan put into his form of oath all the laws and the Constitution of the United States? He requires the voter to swear that he will support the Constitution and the laws of the United States. The voter does not know anything about them. Why not read the whole of them to him and swear him to them?

Mr. HOWARD. The presumption is, that every man knows something about the general principles of the Constitution of the United States. But here is a new condition of things. We are calling to the book men who have been in arms against us, men who have for four or five years last past condemned our authority and resisted it at the point of the bayonet; men who are even now, if they could have their own way, willing and anxious to renew the war, or at all events to take some steps by which they can shake off the authority of the United States and establish an independent government of their own. My idea is that when such a man offers himself for registration he shall be informed by the very terms of the oath itself which he is about to take what are the qualifications of a voter, and not permit him to come up and swear to an inference of law, or a conclusion of law, or to a mere legal opinion, which he would have to do under the form of oath as suggested by this bill. Let him know what the facts are; let the facts stare him in the face when he lays his hand upon the book, and not let him proceed to swear in general terms that he is not excluded by a statute of the United States, of which he may be perhaps, and will be in many cases, totally ignorant.

Sir, this is laying a snare for the consciences of thousands of men, and it is enabling additional thousands to come forward and take this oath and become voters who, if the facts were laid before them at the time they offer themselves, would not dare, in the face of the qualifications which they read, to take the oath and offer themselves as voters. I wish to protect the ballot-box against such impositions.

I tell you, sir, and I assure the Senator from Illinois, that the form of oath which he has suggested in this bill will weigh scarcely a feather with the great mass of the rebels at the South; and that is the view which has already been taken of it. Such is the light in which it has already been viewed by gentlemen in the rebel States who have written to me on the subject, who have seen the form and contents of this oath. They say it is not worth a rush in the form it now stands. I confess, sir, that I shall hesitate long before I vote for a bill which opens the door to so much fraud as may be committed under it.

Now, sir, the act which we passed at the last session expresses the qualifications of a voter, states what they shall be, and defines those qualifications in very brief and in very clear terms. Why not in the form of an oath in which you are about to administer to the voter lay the whole thing like a map before him, so that he may know and judge for himself, and swear at his peril, and not permit him to swear by a mere reference to a former statute, which is not before him, and of which he may know nothing or at least very little.

Mr. SUMNER. From time immemorial statutes have been proverbial for their crudeness and technicality. There is no saying more common, I suppose, than that a person who is not somewhat versed in law had better not undertake to read a statute. There is a saying that comes to my mind of one of the Lord Chancellors of England to this effect: that he should be ashamed of himself if he could not answer a question of common law, and he should be ashamed of himself if he could answer a question of statute law without looking into the book. Now, this oath which the report of the committee prescribes is to impose upon the people at large, the common people, the duty of looking into the statute and of applying their minds to its interpretation. It seems to me that this is to expect too much. I think, therefore, my friend from Michigan has acted wisely in calling attention to this oath and in providing a substitute. I think it is important that in the oath there should be a precise enumeration set forth, in the plainest possible language, of the obligations assumed by the party.

I would go still further than my friend in the oath that I would prescribe. I would require a distinct subscription of what I regard as fundamental articles of political faith at this moment. I would require every person who has been in rebellion, before he shall be allowed to hold office or to vote, to take an oath, not only in general support of the Constitution and in allegiance to it, but specifically that he recognizes the unity of the Republic; that he will not lend himself hereafter to any scheme of secession; that he will not promote in any way any scheme to postpone the national credit or the national debt, or again to uphold the rebel debt by paying it in any form; and that he will support in all respects equal rights, the equality of all before the law. I should like to see such an oath as that prescribed to all in these rebel States who come forward as candidates for office or to vote. I know it may be said that they will take this oath vainly; in other words, that they will perjure themselves, and yet I do think that such a prescription as I now suggest would have a tendency to teach these people what we expect from them in reconstructing the States. However, the proposition of my friend does not go as far as I would go; but it is in every respect better than that of the committee, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, theory is something, but practice is much more. In reference to the necessity of such a provision as this I am inclined to remember how it was upon the soil of Missouri recently. After the disfranchisements ingrafted upon the constitution of Missouri and her laws I know that rebels from Missouri by the hundreds sought a paradise in the Territory of Nebraska in order to get clear of being disfranchised for their part in the rebellion in the State of Missouri, and they have since left us for a more congenial clime; they have emigrated to Texas. They are this day within those States now to be brought into the Union. There is no part or parcel of the propositions or amendments to this bill so distasteful to them as the one now before the Senate. That proposition, as I remember, as I heard it read, is that they shall affirm that they have not been disfranchised. They were disfranchised in Missouri. They ought not to be permitted to run away from States that are in consonance with the progress of the age, into those States to stand in the way of loyal organizations there. Having been appealed to by those whom we regard as loyal representatives of a loyal population in these States, I would vote for the bill without this proposition, I suppose; but I should regret exceedingly to cast a vote for it without this proposition.

Mr. MORTON. There is a part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan that I am not in favor of, simply because I think it would be the means of causing a great deal of perjury to be committed. I allude to that portion which requires them to swear that they are sincerely and truly attached to the Government of the United States. In point of fact, we know that the great mass of these rebels are not attached to and do not love the Government of the United States; but they will take this oath probably for the purpose of securing the right to vote. I think that that portion of the amendment which provides that they shall swear that they will support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will to the best of their ability encourage all others to do the same, is sufficient on that point. If the clause requiring them to swear that they are sincerely and earnestly attached to the Government of the United States is retained, the effect will be to induce these men to commit perjury upon a point on which they never can be convicted. A man will swear that he is sincerely attached to the Government of the United States, and yet you cannot convict him of perjury, although you can prove he has been a rebel. I say, in point of fact, we know that these men are not so attached, and therefore it is not worth while to insert that clause in the oath.

But sir, there is another portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan which I think of great importance, and that is that the oath shall set forth the disqualifications which the voter is required to swear he does not labor under. That is the form of the "iron-clad oath" that we take in this Senate. We are not simply required to swear that we are not subject to the disqualifications contained in a section of the law of 1862, but the disqualifications are set forth in the oath, and they are called to the attention of each member of the Senate when he takes the oath. We are not simply referred to a certain section of a law passed three or four years ago.

By the form of oath prescribed in the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary the voter is required to swear that he is not "excluded from the right to vote by the fifth and sixth sections of said 'act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States.'" Sir, not one person in a hundred in the rebel States will ever see the act referred to; and if the Senators on this floor had been called upon this morning to state what the substance of the fifth and sixth sections of that act was, perhaps they could not do it. If the Senator from Illinois himself had been asked this morning, before his attention was particularly called to it, what were the disqualifications contained in those two sections, or what the character of those sections was, perhaps he could not tell. And yet that is the form of oath that we propose to require of these people who never saw the original act of Congress, who do not know that there is a fifth or a sixth section in the act, who perhaps do not know what are the disqualifications contained in the act and never heard of them; men who cannot read and write; for more than one half of all the men who are called upon to take that oath cannot read and write. They are called upon to swear that they are not subject to the disqualifications mentioned in the fifth and sixth sections of a certain act, when they do not know what the sections are, and never read the act that contains them.

In my opinion, the oath should set forth briefly, but clearly, what these disqualifications are that they are required to swear they do not labor under, that their attention may be called to them as they take the oath, so that they may not commit perjury by inadvertence, or by ignorance, or in a way in which they could not be convicted for it. Why, sir, if you were trying to convict a man for perjury for taking the oath prescribed in the bill, you would have to go on and prove as a matter of fact that he was acquainted with the fifth and sixth sections of the act of Congress passed on the 2d of March, a thing you could not do in one case perhaps out of a hundred. As the Senator from Michigan says, it virtually nullifies the oath, it is a snare; it amounts to nothing.

Now, sir, the oath will not be very long as the Senator from Michigan proposes to amend it. It is not as long as the oath we are required to take in this Senate; and that occasions no particular delay. This oath is not to be taken at an election, where there is a great crowd around and there is a hurry and no time to administer the oath, but is to be taken when the voters are registered; and that is a continuing process from day to day until it is finished. The oath would not be inconveniently long. But, sir, unless the things are specifically stated in the oath which they are required to swear in regard to, they will not know anything about them; it will be a snare; and if they commit perjury they cannot be convicted of it.

As a mere matter of experience ourselves, suppose this oath had been submitted to every member of the Senate this morning, I ask you how they could have answered? There would not be a Senator willing to take the oath without first referring to the act to see what is contained in those sections, aside from the fact that we here having been called upon to pass upon this question have been made familiar with it. But if you were to submit this oath to the people of this city now, there is scarcely a man, unless he is anxious to become a voter, who could take the oath intelligently. To take it intelligently he must refer to the law, and if he cannot do it himself he must get somebody to read it to him. Therefore, to make this oath intelligent and to make it binding on the consciences of men, and to make it effectual and answer the purpose that we want it to answer, it should set forth just what the Senator from Michigan has put into it. I am in favor of that portion of his amendment, but the other part, requiring them to swear that they are sincerely attached to the Government, I am not in favor of, because that is simply a temptation to commit perjury. These men who want to vote are prepared to submit perhaps to the Government, but they cannot swear truly that they love it, and there is no use in asking them to do it.

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator from Indiana will move to strike out the words to which he refers I shall certainly make no objection to it, or I will have them stricken out of my amendment if he will designate them. I do not regard them as of much force. I am willing also to strike out that portion of the amendment which declares that the party shall be guilty of perjury in swearing falsely. I will amend my amendment in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan can modify his own amendment. It is not now in order to move to amend it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think if we look at this subject a little carefully we shall see that there is no necessity for adopting the oath which has been submitted by the Senator from Michigan. The fifth section of the reconstruction act passed at the last session provides:

"That no person excluded from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of the convention to frame a constitution for any of the said rebel States, nor shall any such person vote for members of said convention."

In other words, the fifth section of the act disqualifies as voters those who are disfranchised from holding office under the fourteenth article of Amendments to the Constitution. Who are those persons? They are persons who, having once taken an oath as members of Congress, or as officers of the United States, or as members of a State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, has afterward given aid to the enemy. How many of those persons are there at the South? Here is an affidavit covering the side of a sheet of paper, which is to be submitted to every black man at the South. Six hundred and seventy thousand of them are to read, or have read to them, this affidavit who cannot by any possibility come under the provisions and prohibitions of the law. They have not been members of Congress; they have not held office under the General Government and taken an oath as such to support the Constitution, and then afterward given aid to the enemy. Not only is it useless that those six hundred and seventy thousand should take the oath, but it is useless that a vast majority of the white population of the South should take it. To whom would it apply? It would apply to those who have been members of Congress, members of State Legislatures, who held office under the General Government and had taken the oath to support the Constitution. Does the distinguished Senator from Michigan say that they would not understand the oath in the language in which it is framed in the bill? There is not a single man of them who would not understand it. All those to whom the oath is of any utility are men of intelligence, are as intelligent as our committees, and would fully understand it. I therefore submit that it is subjecting the Government to a vast amount of useless expense and expenditure of time, piling up affidavits by the thousand and hundreds of thousands, that men have not been members of this Senate, members of Congress, officers of the Federal Army, taken an oath of allegiance to this country, and then given aid and comfort to the enemy. It seems to me that every man of intelligence to whom the oath would apply will understand it in the terms in which it is stated in the bill as submitted by the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. The argument used by the Senator from New Jersey applies equally as well against the oath contained in the bill as against the oath contained in the amendment submitted by the Senator from Michigan. If it were proposed to strike out both of these oaths my position might be a little different in regard to that; but as it is not proposed to dispense with swearing altogether, of course it becomes a matter of importance to know which oath is best. The one proposed by the Senator from Michigan is a plain statement of facts, that every black man and every white man in the South can understand. It is a plain, simple oath, such as all of them can be perfectly well informed upon and can swear intelligently to. But the oath submitted in the bill is a very different one. As has been well stated by the Senator from Indiana, it is an oath that could not be intelligently taken by the Senators of the United States this day, although they have the bills before them and are now discussing them. It is an oath that could not be taken intelligently by one per cent. of all the inhabitants to whom it is to be submitted. The oath proposed by the Senator from Michigan is a plain, simple statement of facts, that every one has the power to understand, and it is the only oath that is proposed that is adequate to the purpose. If an oath is necessary, if it is deemed proper and important, this is certainly the oath which should be attached to this bill.

I think on the subject of the time requisite that there is very little difference really in the length of the oaths, and any objection whatever on that score that will apply to the oath submitted by the Senator from Michigan is equally applicable to the oath contained in the bill. I was in hopes that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who is in charge of this bill, would adopt the one proposed by the Senator from Michigan at once. For one I am well satisfied that the people engaged in revolution, and it is true of other countries as well as this, will swear to anything, that they will take almost any kind of oath that may be submitted to them under present circumstances. I believe, for one, that very little value is to be attached to them. Nor does it militate materially against the character of the individual, because they look at this question in a very different light and from a very different stand-point of view from which we look at it. The only objectionable part of the oath submitted by the Senator from Michigan has now been stricken out, and I think it is, as modified, entirely pertinent to the subject, and is most admirably adapted to the occasion. I hope the Senator from Illinois will yet consent to adopt it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Michigan as modified.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to have the amendment reported in full as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

I, —, do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of —, that I have resided in said State for — months next preceding this day, and now reside in the county of —, or the parish of —, in said State, (as the case may be); that I am twenty-one years old; that I have not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States, nor for felony committed against the laws of any State or of the United States; that I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I will faithfully support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will to the best of my ability encourage others so to do; so help me God.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not intend to offer, and probably shall not offer, any amendment to this bill; but let me state to the Senator from Michigan one or two objections to his amendment, which seem to me so apparent that if he takes the same view that I do he will abandon it. My own objection to this first section is that it provides an oath at all. The third section requires certain persons to be designated as judges of election, who are to register the voters, and they are required to be men who can take the iron-clad-oath, as it is called, the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862. They must be loyal men, men who were loyal throughout the war. Then the first section authorizes these loyal men to register the voters, and they are to decide upon the qualifications of the voters. The first section provides that they shall include in the registration "only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid." They are the judges of registration. They pass upon the qualifications of voters. They would not register any one that they did not believe qualified to vote under the law. Then, in addition to that, this bill provides that a certain oath shall be administered to each voter. Now, it seems to me it is scarcely worth while to administer this oath to all. I would authorize the oath to be administered by the registrars in their discretion. According to the laws of Ohio the oath is simply a question of discretion with the registering magistrate, and he may if he chooses administer the oath to the person applying and claiming to be a legal voter. He is not bound by that oath, nor are these persons bound by the oath. If they believe that the man who has taken this oath has committed perjury, they would not put his name upon the roll. The oath is only a mode of getting at the evidence of qualification.

Now, therefore, in administering the oath, it ought to be entirely discretionary with these officers who pass upon the qualification of voters. It seems to me, if any amendment is made at all, it ought to be a provision providing that they may administer the oath to the person applying to be a voter, and then it would be well enough to administer the oath in the ordinary form to answer such questions as may be put to him touching his qualifications to vote, such as how long have you resided in this State? How long have you resided in this ward? How old are you? What part have you taken in the rebellion? Were you an officer of the Government of the United States before the war? All these are mere questions which are put to these persons as witnesses.

It seems to me that to require a stronger oath than this is simple folly. I would not require any, but would leave it entirely to the registrars at their discretion to administer the oath in case they wished to get information as to the qualification of the voter. Suppose a person should apply to have his name registered whom they knew was a legal voter; suppose a negro, whom they knew had lived in that ward and district all the days of his life, should apply to have his name put upon the roll: what would be the use of putting any oath to him when they knew he was a legal voter? It is simply idle. This requires this oath to be administered to everybody. I will venture to say there is not a similar provision in any election law in any State of the Union. Why, sir, when the Senator living in Detroit, if they have a registry law in Michigan, goes up and says, "I am a voter," the registrars put his name down because the judges who decide on that matter know he is a voter entitled to vote in Michigan, and no oath is administered. But these judges are required to administer this oath to every one, to men whom they know to be legal voters, who have always lived in the ward, parish, or county in which they offer to vote. How long would it take to register a thousand persons? These judges must administer this oath themselves. They cannot administer it to a thousand persons a day, nor to five hundred. What is the use of requiring this oath to be administered except when they have a doubt about the qualifications of the applicant? If they have a doubt, then they ought to administer a different form of oath, and put the person whose right to vote is doubted under various questions. They should examine him as a witness, and put to him the ordinary oath, to testify truly as to all questions that may be put to him.

Certainly, therefore, if I was to amend this proposition at all, I would move to strike out the oath, and simply provide that the registrars may, if they believe there is any doubt about the qualification of a voter, put to him the ordinary oath, and examine him touching his qualifications to vote. But since the committee have reported this form of oath, and require it of every person, I certainly would not make it more stringent and make it a long rigmarole—I do not use the word disrespectfully—but a long oath, the mere reading and recital of which will occupy day and days. If the oath of the Senator from Michigan is required, as it would be, to be put to every person entitled to vote in a county in Georgia, when would they make out the registry? It would take them months to do it. It seems to me, therefore, it is absurd to carry the thing so far as the Senator from Michigan proposes.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Ohio makes war upon the very framework of the bill. If I understand him, he is dissatisfied with its provisions in this, that it does not leave to the board of registration discretionary authority to decide the question in all cases whether the person offering himself for registration is qualified or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; the bill expressly does leave it.

Mr. HOWARD. I know the bill does; but the Senator from Ohio seems to think the bill defective in not leaving it wholly to the discretion of the board.

Mr. SHERMAN. When to put the oath. I think they ought not in all cases to be required to administer the oath.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not make war upon the bill in that respect, Mr. President. I think the frame of the bill and the policy of the bill is all right in that regard. I do not think it ought to be left to the discretion of the board of registration to determine the question in all cases and without his oath whether the voter is a qualified voter or not. The Senator is ignorant probably of some statutes in the United States which take away from the board of election the power of determining the question whether or not the elector is qualified. In my own State, it is the right of the person offering himself and who has been challenged to take a certain oath, and thereupon to deposit his vote; this right is absolute and unconditional. The board have nothing to do with the question when that oath is taken, and the party takes it at his peril.

Now, sir, my ideas are in entire coincidence with the Committee on the Judiciary as to the authority to be given to the board. The committee say that the board shall register such persons only as are qualified according to the act which we have passed, and who shall, in addition to the fact of their being qualified, take the following oath. And why is this required? As the lawyers say ex abundante cautela, for greater safety, for greater caution. It is a species of evidence which is addressed to the board of registration, and they are to weigh it, although it is certainly not true that under this bill a person who takes this oath is absolutely entitled to be registered. I take it, some discretionary authority is left in the board.

What I want is precisely what I have said, that when a person offers himself as a voter the facts qualifying him as such shall be brought directly home to his attention and his understanding by the exhibition of the facts themselves in the form of the oath which he is required to take; so that there shall be no mistake about it; and not to permit him to swear to a mere inference of law as the bill proposes. By the bill he is required only to swear that he is not excluded by the operation of the fifth and sixth sections of the act of March 2, 1867. On the other hand, holding it to be the duty of Congress to take all security possible in the shape of evidence of his qualifications, I propose that he shall be made acquainted on the spot with the facts which constitute those qualifications. I think the amendment in its present shape cannot fail to receive the assent of the Senate. I have stricken out the two clauses to which objection was made as being useless.

One word, sir, as to the great and alarming length of this oath. I suppose if printed in an ordinary newspaper it would probably occupy about one square. It is not more than twice the oath embraced in the bill. Why, then, make an objection upon the ground that it is too long? The Senator from Ohio stigmatizes it, or endeavors to stigmatize it, as "rigmarole." Sir, are the qualifications which we have required in the act of March 2 mere rigmarole? Is it mere rigmarole to inform the voter, when he offers himself for registration, in the form of a printed oath, what are the qualifications which he must possess, and which he must swear that he possesses? Is it mere rigmarole to present the facts of the case plainly and with legal certainty to the man who is interested in them? That may be the Senator's style of pleading in the courts of Ohio; but that is not my understanding of certainty to a "common intent." My idea is to let a man be informed of what he is swearing to, and not ask him to swear to a conclusion of law, to swear blindly, without a knowledge of the facts.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, for one I like the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, and I shall vote for it. I am satisfied, on reflection, that it will be a great deal better to have the oath state upon its face what it means than merely to enable the parties who are to take it by reference to some law which they may not know to ascertain its definition.

I cannot agree at all with the Senator from Ohio as to the objections to this oath and requiring it in all cases, nor can I agree as to the propriety or safety of committing to the enrolling boards the office which he proposes. In the first place, the length of the oath is no objection to it in point of time or otherwise. Why? Because printed blanks are to be used, furnished to the persons who are to be registered, subscribed by them, and filed. Now, it is a matter of no consequence whatever, it does not shorten the process one moment, to invent an oath which is expressed in few words rather than in many; but on the contrary, I submit to the Senate, it would be a very certain mode of consuming time to prescribe an oath which would render it necessary to look up the law and refer to it, or have, as the Senator from Ohio seems to suppose this would render necessary, the enrolling board explain to the electors as they come up the meaning of the oath which they are to take. That would take time; and by as much as you shorten it, and by the omissions in the oath itself, put upon the board of registration the onus of making this explanation, by so much do you encumber and hinder the process of registration.

One other remark in reply to what was said by the Senator from Ohio. In the State of New York, as in the State of Michigan—I cannot say how it may be in other States—pretty much everything judicial is taken away from the board of registrars. Their duties are ministerial almost entirely. A man comes and takes an oath at his peril by which he puts his name upon the register. It is perjury if that oath is false, by our statutes. Still, even the amount of discretion left under registry laws like that to those boards is so great that it would be unsafe in communities like those for which we are legislating. In the State of Massachusetts or the State of Ohio, where not only the community is enlightened, but where it is divided into political parties, where there are committees and persons to act as sentinels, not only when the votes are cast, but when the registration is made, to challenge, to investigate, to scrutinize, you may safely leave a very broad discretion to the boards of registration. But, sir, may you for any such reason as that safely vest it in these boards of registrars; men to be appointed, how? By the military commandant of the district, selected either from his military posse or among other persons. Here is a board of three persons to enroll the voters in a certain county. It consists, perhaps, of two private soldiers and some citizen who is found able to take the oath which is prescribed for him as an officer. Is it to be supposed that it would be safe for that board to station itself somewhere and allow the electors of that county, if there is but one board in a county, which is one of the possibilities contemplated by this bill, would it be safe for this board to sit down and wait until all the electors had come? How long would it take? But if they came, would it be safe to trust to them the discretion of determining finally (because there is no appeal) who shall be entitled to vote, and who not? On the contrary, I submit that for abundant caution, as the Senator from Michigan has well said, the true way is to provide that these persons shall furnish to the electors printed oaths, which they make out beforehand, which may be circulated among the people, which they may understand, which they may subscribe at their leisure, and which they may come and present not all on one day; not a great number of them at the same time trusting to the dispatch of this board to examine and investigate and determine, but as they please, as they can find opportunity and access to the board, to the end that in addition to whatever the board may do, in spite of whatever the board may omit, we shall have record evidence of some sort that these even have a certain name, live in a certain length of time, and are in all respects as specified in the oath which it is proposed they shall take.

Now, I submit that in addition to furnishing very great additional safeguards for the attainment of the end which we all have in view—for certainly nobody means that anybody shall be restored to vote unless he is qualified under the statutes which have been passed and under this bill—in addition, I say, to furnishing great safeguards in that respect, it seems to me that nothing can facilitate so much, nothing can relieve these boards so much, nothing can expedite the business of registration so much as to furnish printed blanks which shall show at once all there is that enters into the oath, without reference to any law or constitutional amendment, and without any explanation or examination from the boards of registrars themselves. It will leave for them nothing to do except to affix their jurat when a man comes with his oath subscribed and proposes to file it. They are to sign their names at the conclusion of the words “subscribed and sworn before us on the — day of —,” and it is the only thing they have to do. Therefore, sir, I think on every account the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is wise, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have tried to ascertain the difference really between the bill and the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan as touching the real object of this bill; and it is very difficult for me to see any difference at all. What is the object of this oath? It is to prevent that class of persons who are excluded from participation in the reorganization of these States under the fifth section of the act here referred to from participating in it. That is the object. Now, how does the oath prescribed here effect that object? In what way? Simply as furnishing evidence to the board of registration; that is all. I cannot conceive that it is intended to have any other effect, or in fact that it can have any other effect. It requires the man who presents himself for registration to furnish evidence of the fact of whether he comes within the excluded class provided for in the act to which this is supplementary, and it puts him on his oath to disclose it, thinking that a more solemn form of interrogation. That is all there is of it.

If that is so, the only question to be settled is whether the provision in the original bill accomplishes that object. No one will say it does not if the man should swear truly. It is only upon the supposition that somebody will present himself who does not know what the fifth section of the act is that the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Michigan is supposed to be necessary at all, because it will be found on an examination and careful analysis of the two that the amendment is identical in substance with the provision in the bill. It simply differs from it in the recital it makes of the terms of the statute to which it refers. For instance, the bill provides that the person offering himself for registration, before he shall be registered, shall swear that he does not come, in substance, within the fifth section of the act to which this is supplementary. By the amendment he is made to swear substantially and really the same thing, but he is required to go on and recite the terms of the fifth section; and that is all the difference there is. The legal effect is the same; the object is the same; and the result is the same, of course. All I want to say is that those who favor the oath stated in this bill really cannot have any well-grounded objection to the oath proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

But, Mr. President, I rose to advert simply to another point which has been adverted to by the honorable Senator from Ohio; and that is, that the administration of this oath ought not to be made imperative. I speak of it only by way of convenience. It ought to be left discretionary with the judges of registration. The object of the oath, I have said, is to furnish evidence to the registrars of the character of the person who offers to be registered. If they are satisfied by other evidence that he does not come within the excluded class, of course there is no object in administering the oath; the time occupied in so doing is lost, and it is only an embarrassment. Therefore I should hope that the administration of this oath, if it is amended, will be left optional.

But, sir, while I am up let me say that I do not attach much importance to the oath any way. From what I have said it will be seen that I attach no importance to it except as furnishing a convenient mode of obtaining evidence as to the persons who are to be permitted by the fundamental act to organize these communities. Sir, if I had no other hope for the success of the reconstruction of those communities, States, towns, municipalities, than such as would arise on the oaths of these persons, I should have very little hope of the future of that country. I have noticed that during this discussion some Senators thought it was vastly important that these people should say that they are attached to this Government. I do not want them to say that. I do not believe they are. I hope the time will come when they will be, and I believe the time will come when these people will have different notions on that subject. Nor do I care, so far as this reconstruction is concerned, whether they say they are attached to the Government or not; nor do I attach the slightest importance to the declaration that they may make, as to whether they will in the future enter into another rebellion. Sir, if we have not settled that by arms forever, if this Government is not established to-day beyond the power of these men in the future, then God save the Commonwealth. We are to trust to events to settle this question of reconstruction, present, past, and future. There is a logic and a power in the events which this war has decided that will settle all these things and render the efforts of these little people so puny and insignificant in the future that these oaths, in my judgment, will be considered exceedingly trifling and unimportant.

Therefore, sir, I say that simply and only as a matter of evidence do I attach the slightest importance to any oath that may be required; and I repeat that in any oath that may be required, whether it is in general or, as the honorable Senator from Michigan proposes, in detail, I hope it may be left to the discretion of the parties making the registration, so that if they are satisfied upon other evidence then they will not take the trouble to administer the oath. As it now stands, as I understand it, it would require the officer making the registration in every instance before he could register the party to administer this oath.

Mr. DRAKE. Without wishing to prolong debate on this subject, I think that perhaps I can state some facts connected with the experience of Missouri in regard to an oath to be taken by voters which may be of some interest to gentlemen in forming their judgment upon this question. It so happens that in the constitution of Missouri an oath is prescribed as a necessary qualification for every voter which refers to the provisions of that constitution in the way that the oath now contained in the bill before the Senate refers to the act of March 2, 1867. There the voter is required to swear that he is well acquainted with the terms of the third section of the second article of the constitution of Missouri, and that he has never done any of the acts specified in that section. I am enabled to state as a matter of universal experience there that not one man probably in ten ever took that oath in order to vote who knew anything whatever of the contents of the third section of the second article of that constitution. I can state the further fact that known rebels there have taken that oath, first being very careful never to read the third section of the second article of the constitution. I have known men there to vote who said that they never had read that section of that article; and yet they would go up to the polls or before the registering officer and sign the oath and take it, and when they have been confronted by the registering officers with a reading of the third section of the second article of the constitution many of them have instantly backed down and retired from the effort to have themselves registered. These are facts.

The very same state of case will arise in these southern States. Men will come up and swear by the general terms of the oath as embodied in the bill that they are not disqualified under the fifth and sixth sections of the act of March 2, 1867, when they have never read those sections and do not know anything about their contents. I am, therefore, in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan which states in the oath the particular things which they are to declare; and I believe that in no other way than that can we get at anything like a discrimination in the southern States between those who are legally entitled to vote and those who are not.

Mr. WILSON. I desire, Mr. President, simply to say that the original oath merely contemplated that the person taking it should declare his sincere attachment to the Union and the Government of the United States; that he would steadfastly support the Constitution and obey the laws, and to the best of his ability engage others to such support and obedience. It was a question originally whether it was best to have any oath at all. The primary object of the oath was this: we have nearly seven hundred thousand new voters of an emancipated race; there is a great deal of hostility in some quarters to their voting, and it was supposed that requiring an oath of every elector that he would obey the laws, the laws of the United States giving these men the right to vote, we would prevent his disobeying the laws, or by violence or any other acts driving these people from the polls. That is the reason why an oath was put in the bill in the first place. The committee have amended it by putting in this provision in regard to persons who are disfranchised by the constitutional amendment. If that is to be in the oath, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan certainly sets forth the facts of the case; and any person who takes the oath will understand it better in that form than the other. I have, therefore, no objection to that amendment under the circumstances of the case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was the House that put in this provision—

Mr. WILSON. I know.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not an amendment made by the Judiciary Committee; it comes here from the House in this form, and has not been stricken out. I am very free to say that I should be entirely satisfied myself with an oath of the voter that he would support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States without anything else. I should have been entirely satisfied with that in committee; but the bill came to us from the House with this provision in it, and we thought it better, as they had put it in, not to get into a controversy about it. So far as I am individually concerned I should be quite as well satisfied with a simple oath that the voter would support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States.

And now let me say a word as to this discrimination, which only applies to a few persons. This bill, and the one to which it is supplementary, do not disfranchise any one except those persons who are disqualified from holding office by our constitutional amendment. That applies only to the intelligent, educated classes of the South who have held office and taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States in former times. That is the only class of persons to whom it applies, and there are not very many of them. They would be known to the registering officers probably all through the South. I do not think there is any importance in having the words in; and if a motion had been made to strike them out I should not have resisted it, although I would not make such a motion myself. I would be willing to leave it an oath merely to support the Constitution and obey the laws. I hope, however, we may get a vote on this question, and before

I sit down I desire to appeal to Senators to let us have a vote on it. It is not very material, perhaps, one way or the other whether the amendment is adopted or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to inquire of my friend from Illinois whether he puts the same construction, that this requires an affidavit in the case of every voter?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it does.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, is that right? Is it worth while to require the oath of every black man that comes up to have his name registered? I will not offer any amendment, as I have said before, but it seems to me that it is throwing on these registrars an enormous amount of labor to take the affidavit of every person who comes forward to be registered. The great body of them cannot write their names, and they will not understand exactly what is meant, and every negro that comes up to be registered will have to make his mark on the paper. It seems to me to make the machinery cumbrous; but still I do not propose to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment.

Mr. MORTON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Harlan, Henderson, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wade, and Yates—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. Before proceeding to make the motion of which I gave notice the other day, I desire to move an amendment which is of little more than a verbal character, and the effect of which will be to remove ambiguity in a certain passage of the bill. I move in section four of the committee's substitute to insert the words "and registered" after the word "qualified" in line three; so that the section shall read: "that if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified and registered as herein specified." I believe the insertion of the word "registered" does not add anything to the meaning of the committee, but it removes an ambiguity which I fear, if the words are left as they are now—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It would be better to insert the word "all" before "the electors."

Mr. SUMNER. And perhaps there is no need of retaining the word "qualified."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that that question was discussed in the House of Representatives; an effort was made there by a member from Ohio, I think, to let the submission of the constitution be decided by a majority of those voting at that election. It was understood there, and it was understood in the Judiciary Committee, that the section as it stands requires a majority of all the registered voters in favor of the constitution to adopt it. I think that is the meaning of it; it reads "a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified," not "a majority of those voting," but a "majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified." Now, who are "qualified?" The registered voters.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; but the word "registered" removes all ambiguity, and I hope it will be adopted, so that there can be no question on this point. I modify my amendment by moving to insert "all" before "the electors," and to substitute "registered" for "qualified;" so as to make the language read: "ratified by a majority of the votes of all the electors registered as herein specified."

Mr. DRAKE. I will make an inquiry of the honorable chairman of the committee, whether it was before the mind of the committee in framing this section that to require a majority of all the registered voters was changing the terms of the reconstruction act; for the reconstruction act says that the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification, not a majority of all the registered voters?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will reply to the Senator from Missouri. I am aware that this does change a requirement in the act of last session, and it is a question for the Senate whether it will make that change. That is not the point now; the Senator from Massachusetts inquires what is meant by the language as it is. It will be, if any Senator should raise that question, for the Senate hereafter to decide, if it thinks proper, whether it shall require a majority of the registered voters to adopt the constitution. At any rate, that point should be expressed in language readily understood. I have no objection to make that clear one way or the other, which seems to be in controversy. In my judgment it is clear now; but if others think differently, I have no objection to adopting words that will make the meaning specific. Whether it shall be one way or the other is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. CONKLING. Then let us adopt this amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the insertion of the words proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, because, as the committee understood, the clause means that now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot vote for this amendment; and I am not sure that the bill as it stands bears the interpretation which it will bear if the amendment be adopted. I am in favor of the provision on the subject to be found in the original act, that the decision of the majority of the voters is to conclude the question of constitution or no constitution. I can readily imagine that this state of things may exist; there may be some persons in these States who are against a return of the States to the Union, and they may be of that class who may have it in their power to influence that ignorant class to whom we have given the right of suffrage; they may be able to persuade them that the right will be much more secure if they remain under the General Government exclusively than they would be if they were placed under a State government; and it is putting, therefore, to some hazard, as I think, the return of these States to the Union, a result which we all, I suppose, have much at heart.

It is idle to deny that, however the question may be considered as settled now by the decision of Congress, and however it may be settled by the country, the black voter, as he now becomes in the South (whatever may be his condition in the future, whatever may be the condition of his descendants in the future) is in a state of absolute ignorance. It has been, for reasons which obviously will occur to us all, the policy of the South for the last twenty years to keep the blacks in a state of ignorance. It was evidently apprehended that the moment they became intelligent, the moment they came to know what were the rights of man, according to the theory of our Government, the institution of slavery would be in peril; and for the very purpose of guarding against that peril and preserving this domestic institution, which many of the southern people believed to be better fitted for their condition and what they understood to be the cause of constitutional freedom than anything else, they kept them in a condition more ignorant, generally speaking, than the inhabitants of this land when the land first received the step of civilization.

Hence, in my judgment, if there be a few whites who desire to keep these States as they now are, under military rule, under a belief that if the States are restored their influence will be diminished or entirely destroyed, as these poor negroes have been made to believe, whether justly or not it is immaterial to inquire, that they are their friends, that they are the only parties in the South who are anxious to give them the rights of man, they may possibly be able to persuade the negroes that they will fail to enjoy those rights in a State government to be formed under the provisions of this bill. They may say to these men, "Stay away from the polls; do not vote; and the effect of your absence will be to defeat the plan of organizing a State and to leave you as you are, under, as you believe, the greater protection of the General Government, and above all, to remove you from the danger in which you will be if a State government is reorganized."

I think it was because of this danger, in part, that the provision upon this subject was incorporated with almost universal assent into the original act, and I see no reason now for altering it, except the reason suggested by my friend from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] yesterday in support of the amendment which he offered, that a State government should not be forced upon these people if a majority of the people were against it. That, if there were no other objections to suffering these States to remain as they now are, which, as I think, are objections paramount to the one stated by my friend from Maine, would be a good objection if those to whom we have just given the right of suffrage were intelligent enough to decide that question. Believing that they are not, but perfectly willing, that being the law, that they shall vote upon the question the one way or the other, choose delegates or not choose delegates, and then vote upon the constitution, for it or against it, I am decidedly in favor of providing that whether the State is or is not to become a government in itself and one of the States of the Union shall be tested by a decision of the majority of those voting.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, this bill appears to me to be very remarkable as a law of elections on account of the entire absence of any provisions against fraud, either in the holding of the election, or in the polling of illegal votes, or in the returns to be made to the commanding generals of the several districts, or in the returns to be made by them subsequently. For aught that I can perceive fraud may be practiced by an officer or by an agent concerned in the execution of this law with perfect impunity. The sixth section of the amendment of the Judiciary Committee is also very general and objectionable with regard to the expense. It provides that all expenses incurred by the several commanding generals, or by virtue of any orders issued, or appointments made by them, under and by virtue of this act, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. There seems to be no regulation with regard to the amount of expense which is to be incurred, and an appropriation, as I understand it, is made here absolutely without any proceeding for the investigation of the amounts expended as to their reasonableness and necessity.

The act is, however, abundant in regard to oaths. The fifth section requires the officers of registration and of election to take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, which will exclude very large classes of persons from any participation in the control of these elections; and then in the first section the oath already spoken of in this debate is prescribed for voters. It is with regard to that that I propose to submit an amendment—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would inform the Senator from Pennsylvania that there is an amendment to an amendment now pending.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will suggest, then, that when it comes to be in order I shall move to amend the first section by omitting all those parts of the proposed oath which do not relate to obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I feel constrained, Mr. President, to vote against this amendment. If this provision needs any qualification we should make it in the other direction. The section as it now stands means a majority of the votes given on the question, and I have no doubt that would be the judicial decision. At any rate, I am sure that was the intention of the original bill, and I am surprised that anybody ever doubted it. It ought to be so—a majority of the votes given ought to determine it. Take the State of Virginia, lying close by us, as an illustration. There are about three hundred thousand voters in that State, including the new voters we have made. The question of ratification is to be submitted to the people of the State, and the more unanimous they are the fewer will be the number of votes cast. If there are three hundred thousand voters registered, one hundred and fifty-one thousand are required to vote for the constitution according to this amendment. In all the States when constitutional amendments or new constitutions are submitted to the people, unless the submission is on the day of a general election for officers, the vote is light. I do not believe there are half a dozen State constitutions that were adopted by the votes of a majority of all the voters of the States for which they were made. The effect of this amendment will be to retard the adoption of these constitutions and to postpone the admission of these States. I deem it to be the crowning act, the grandest act we can perform, to bring these States in, to restore them to their practical relations at the earliest day on the principles, terms, and conditions we have imposed, for these principles, terms, and conditions are sanctioned by patriotism, liberty, and justice. The sooner these ten rebel States incorporate into their constitutions these principles, terms, and conditions, the sooner these States accept the policy of the equality of man, the better for all. God speed that great work.

Sir, suppose these conventions meet, frame constitutions, and you require that they shall have for ratification a majority of all the votes registered, counting against them all the votes so cast and all the votes that are registered that do not come to the polls, what will be the consequence? Not one of these constitutions are sure of adoption. Suppose a constitution is submitted at harvest time, or when the people are largely engaged and pressed with business, a pressing time, when they are gathering cotton, when labor is very valuable, and men have to travel some distance to vote, and the people generally acquiesce in the constitution; there is no excitement about it, no opposition in the newspapers; no speeches against it; a majority will hardly go to the polls, and if a majority do not go to the polls it is defeated. We have seldom submitted to the people of Massachusetts a constitutional amendment for which we have obtained one half of all the votes of the State. We recently put into our constitution a provision with less than one fifth of the votes polled at the election. So it is all over the country. Look at the result in New York last autumn, when the question of calling a constitutional convention was submitted to the people of the State at the general election. Thousands of men who went to the polls to vote for officers failed to vote on that question. Thousands of men who vote for candidates take no interest in voting upon constitutional questions.

Sir, instead of adopting a policy that will tend to keep any of these States out a day, I believe it is the highest duty that can devolve upon us as statesmen to bring these States here on the terms we have imposed at the earliest possible day. Then will be finished the grand work in which we have been engaged—the preservation of the country, the general advancement of the cause of liberty. Then we shall have saved the country, made everybody free, secured everybody civil rights, given the right of suffrage to all men, without distinction of race or color, and brought these erring States back here, filled these seats, and have crowned the great work of the last seven years.

Let me say further, Mr. President, that it is not policy to be smiting our friends in the face when they come here and offer to help us restore our country. Caring something for the ideas and principles we profess, and the triumph of those ideas and principles in the country, I protest against any vote or any legislation that tends to check or hinder the organization of these States on the terms we have proposed.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to ask the Senator a question if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. We shall all agree, I think, that when the registration takes place in the South, it will fail to contain the names of all the qualified voters in the various States. Now, I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he is in favor of bringing in any of these States when, after all the processes we have provided, there cannot be found among the rebels, whose names will be registered in spite of all we can do, the loyal white men and the black men—the three classes put together—enough to make a naked majority of the number borne upon the registration.

I do not mean to interrupt the Senator by making any further remark, but I should like to have the question answered in view of the fact, which I think we may assume, that these conventions, determining as they are to do the time when the vote is to be taken, will not be likely to put it at harvest or at high water or at any other impossible time to reach the polls. Assuming that a fair expression is to be had, I want to know whether it be sound that we are to insist upon bringing States in here without having any evidence that a majority of their people of all sorts and conditions put together are in favor of their coming in.

Mr. WILSON. I will answer that question. In the act fixing the terms and conditions of admission we provided that a majority of the votes given on the question of ratification should settle the question; and this bill which I introduced intended to adhere to that provision. That was the meaning of the original bill. That action of Congress was right, and we ought not to change the meaning of the act or the intention of it. The judicial construction of the bill as it stands would be that it means a majority of the votes cast, and in this opinion I am sustained by high legal authority.

Now, sir, we submit the terms and conditions to the people of each of these States; we provide for a registration. That registration may be made very complete; there is no difficulty in making it nearly perfect. Then we call on the persons registered to elect delegates to the convention; and they elect, by an overwhelming majority, delegates in favor of complying with the terms and conditions we have proposed, and those delegates meet and vote to make a constitution. They make a constitution, and incorporate into it all we have ever asked or can ask them to incorporate, guarantying and securing personal rights, and acting in perfect harmony with the general judgment of the people. Then the constitution is submitted to the people at a special election. Everybody knows that under such circumstances an election is a mere form. There is no contest over it; all men and all parties are agreed to it. Under such a state of facts, when the day of election should come we should find that less than half of the registered voters had voted. More than half the voters agreeing with those who have voted do not go to the ballot-box. Should not that constitution be adopted under such circumstances? Not only is that a probable case, but it is the common case with constitutions and amendments in all parts of the country. The great State of New York is to have a constitutional convention this year. Now, I venture to predict that if the constitution made by that convention be submitted to the people on a day when there is not a general election of public officers not more than a fourth or a third of the voters of that State will go to the ballot-box to vote upon it, unless there is a great contest over some of the principles of the constitution which will bring out a vote. The more united the people are in its favor the fewer will be the votes cast. The contest will be in the choice of delegates. Then the people will vote. I would not object to requiring a majority of the registered voters to vote for or against the convention on the day of the election of delegates; but I do earnestly object to permitting the stay-at-homes to defeat a constitution framed in the interests of the country and the rights of man.

Sir, I believe these States will generally with very little effort elect delegates who will not only comply with the terms we have imposed, but a majority of most of the conventions that will be heartily in favor of them. I believe further that the men in favor of those conditions will at once enter upon the general direction and control of at least half of these States, and all of them in a very short time, and it cannot be otherwise. In those States there are nine hundred thousand white voters and over seven hundred thousand black voters. I have no question how these black men will vote so long as their rights are contested. When everybody acquiesces in them, when everybody builds school-houses for them, when everybody concedes all their rights, they may divide as other men do, but at present ninety-nine out of every hundred of these men will vote just as they fought, for the country, for freedom, for emancipation, for civil rights, for enfranchisement, for elevation, for improvement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There seems to be a difference of opinion on that point.

Mr. WILSON. After we have secured to these men the suffrage we fear to trust them, do we? I have no fear on that point. They voted all right in Georgetown the other day; not a man of them on the wrong side. They voted all right in Alexandria the other day. They will carry every city from here to the Rio Grande if we give them the chance to do it. There are few Democratic negroes, and they cannot be Johnsonized. In these States there is a large class of Union men who were Union men in heart all through the war. They have twenty-five thousand white Union voters in Alabama for Union and liberty, and with the negro vote of that State they can carry it. If the organization, the speeches, the work that will be put forth in the State of Connecticut this year were put forth in the ten rebel States we could carry nearly every one of them by a decisive majority. Take South Carolina; there is a majority of at least twenty-five thousand black men who are voters in that State; there are some few white Union men; there are several thousand men who do not believe in the rebellion, who have abandoned the doctrine of secession, and who are with us in sentiment and feeling. I want to meet these friends of the country with the warm grasp of the hand, and not smite them in the face and send them back. It is not the part of wisdom; it is the blindest political action that was ever inaugurated by men.

We have fought the battle of ideas, and we have triumphed; we have fought the battle in the field, and we have won. We have dictated the terms and conditions of reconstruction, and they are in accordance with God's holy word, with the Declaration of Independence, and the rights of human nature. We want the work completed; we want these State constitutions to be like our constitutions. We want these people to acquiesce in these doctrines and have them the common, accepted, recognized ideas, for they will bring peace, order, and security to the freedmen, worth a thousand of your armies there. We want the grand work of renovation to commence in that part of our country, building up, elevating, improving the condition of the whole people. Gentlemen have the idea that it will not do to trust these people; that it will not do to trust even the black men after we have given them their rights. Do gentlemen want to go into the next presidential election and fight the battle in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Indiana in face of the fact that nearly four years after the conquest and surrender of the rebel armies we have not had capacity enough to complete the restoration of the States, and that even when we had made our own terms and conditions, and the men of those States were anxious to accept them, we would not allow them to do so? I venture to say that eight of these ten States have decisive majorities to-day in favor of taking these terms and conditions and adhering to them as long as their States shall last. The enfranchisement of seven hundred thousand freedmen—seven sixteenths of all their voters—changes the face of affairs, makes those States friends of the country, of liberty, and of the Republican policy.

The future of the South is for the unity of the Republic, the rights of man, and the radical Republican policy, if we will have it so. I want a policy of liberality to be at once inaugurated. It is time to stop all petty criticisms when your great and grand work is done and your own ideas are dominant. Give that people a fair chance to accept your terms, and thus end the great controversy. Why put conditions the only effect of which is to keep our friends out? There are men in those States who were compromised in the rebellion, who are proscribed by your constitutional amendment, who cannot come into this Chamber, who cannot take your test oath, who are spending time and money to spread Union and liberal ideas. These men are working for us now. They think as the majority of us think, and feel as we feel. They want to act with us, and I want them to act with us for the good of our common country. I do not, will not distrust them. I cannot repulse their advances nor chide them. I will meet them with the warm grasp of fraternity, and bid them God speed in the work of restoration.

Therefore, sir, I think that we ought to leave the ratification of these constitutions to a majority of the people of these States who cast their votes. They will be registered; they will go the ballot-box at the election for delegates. Then they will consider the great battle fought. When they elect delegates and when the constitutions are generally acquiesced in they will think the contest is all over. It is proposed that after all this, unless a majority of them go to the ballot-box and vote for these constitutions the work shall be lost. Why should that be? What is to be gained by it? Can we not trust the majority of the men who vote? I think we can, and I shall so vote.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I wish I had a part of the clear perception and far-reaching vision of the distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat. He seems to see with natural eyes what common people are not quite so observant of. The bill to which he seems so much attached, and which passed before I returned to my seat—arriving just in time to cast a vote to make it a law, notwithstanding the veto of the President—it seems did not fully meet the views of the large majority of both Houses of Congress, and when this supplemental bill is brought in here the honorable Senator from Massachusetts seems to think that its discussion is all out of order, and, recurring to the original bill, he says that it is so nominated in the bond. Now, sir, I concur with the majority of both branches of Congress that that bill needed some amendment; but the distinguished Senator seems to assume, and does assume, that these States should be treated in all respects as though they had been guilty of no wrong, no outrage; had been guilty of no sin to bring down on them the condemnation of this Government and the enlightened world.

Allow me to remind the Senator from Massachusetts that this is not a mere question of the admission of States, but it is a question of the admission of rebellious States, and a rebellion of that order that it clothed a nation in mourning. I repeat I have no longing to embrace the leaders of this rebellion, and I say that the common prudence which we exercise in the ordinary questions that arise in course of business life requires that we should be over cautious rather than wanting in caution in prescribing the mode for their coming back. I am not unmindful of the triumphs of the last six years; I have not had the honor of sharing in them so largely as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts; but I yield to no one in an ardent admiration for the triumphs that have been achieved. It is to maintain those triumphs, to hold the fruits of those glorious triumphs, that this amendment is proposed. Had these States never rebelled I am free to say that a majority of the voters actually voting would have satisfied me; but they have rebelled, and I see in this movement the entering wedge to the unaccountable gushings of fraternal feeling of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts toward them. Just before the close of the session of yesterday a resolution was introduced to relieve the disabilities of some gentlemen who come within the provisions of this bill. Sir, this is but "the beginning of the end." You let one loop-hole be made in the restrictions that surround these States in their coming in, and you will have a flood of them. If I understood this resolution to which I have alluded, it was to relieve the disability of Governor Patton. I stand here with the record to prove him one of the reddest-handed rebels in Alabama, and it is that class of men that I want to guard against; but it seems that in this moment of out-gushing sympathy we are going to embrace not only the disfranchised class in this bill, but everybody else that wants to come.

Mr. President, I have not the highest confidence in this registration of voters. We have right under our eyes here an example that should induce us to be cautious. The State of Maryland passed a registration law which forbade the registration of rebels or those that sympathized with rebellion during the war. In the autumn of last year that State was well nigh in rebellion upon that question. What is the result? The result is to-day that every man that sympathized with rebellion in Maryland is a voter and voted against the class of men not allowed to vote there that my friend so much loves and admires. Now, sir, what is the fruit of that registration? A Senator is elected to this body that crowned his ministerial career in Buchanan's administration by transferring a million of money from New York to New Orleans to be seized.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very unwilling to interrupt the Senator, but it appears to me—he will permit me to say so—to discuss in advance the claims of a gentleman to a seat in this Senate who has been elected by a Legislature of a State by a pretty unanimous vote is going rather too far.

Mr. NYE. I did not intend to do that. I speak here as to this fruit of a registration, in which I say I have no confidence.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think, if my honorable friend will permit me to tell him, that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. NYE. That is a question that will be discussed hereafter, upon which I do not desire to enter now.

Mr. JOHNSON. All I intended to say was that I should very much prefer, and, if the honorable member will permit to say so, I think the Senate would prefer, that he should reserve any remarks he may have to make upon the claims of that gentleman to the confidence of this body until he presents himself here.

Mr. NYE. I do not desire, Mr. President, at all to disturb the equilibrium of the honorable Senator from Maryland. I speak of the history of the past and the present. I am appealing to the good judgment of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts not to put too much confidence in this registration. I tell you, Mr. President, that I have seen registrations for the last twenty-five years, and with all the care that is thrown about them there is always danger of frauds in them. For instance, in the city of New York you see Patrick O'Flanagan voting upon papers that were taken out forty years before he was born [laughter] by a man of the same name, and that name never died. [Laughter.] A man twenty-one years old will vote upon papers that were taken out in 1816, and I have seen it done. Therefore I do not propose to place too much confidence in this registration; but I appeal to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether he will not at least require a majority of the registered votes to decide the question. He says no. I think that everything cautions us to act prudently in this matter. I undertake to say that with all the safeguards we can throw around this matter we shall be cheated enough; rebels will vote over this registration, and they will not take the oath as blindly as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] described this morning, and their apology will be that they did not know what the sections they swore about were. Let them know what the sections are, and let this nation know, when these States come here for admission with their representatives, that a majority of the registered vote is essential upon the question whether they shall have a constitution or not, or upon the question whether the constitution which is framed is adopted or not. Let our guide be a majority of the registered vote speaking upon that question.

I want once more to caution my friend against extending his Christian charity too far toward these men. Sir, we have a high example of the manner of which rebels were treated by Divine power. When the arch-rebel was convicted before a tribunal that unmasked rebellion to its nakedness, he was thrown over the battlement, kicked out, and he has never returned to disturb the peaceful reign of Him who reigns over all. Here my friend, reversing that great and divine example, says he wants to hug them at once—to reach out his hands for them. [Laughter.] It is simply a matter of taste, in which I do not share with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I hope that the Senate will have the manhood at least to say that a majority of the registered votes shall be required in the election upon the ratification of the constitutions formed by these States prior to their readmission.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do hope that the Senate will come to a vote.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me the floor for a few minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me say a word, and then I will yield to the Senator. I hope the Senate will come to a vote upon this question. There was an understanding yesterday that we should vote about this hour; but this general discussion, which is very gratifying to us all, if it goes on, will prevent our getting a vote today. I do not mean my remark for the Senator from Massachusetts, and I will now give way to him; but I appeal generally to the Senate to let us carry out the understanding of yesterday as soon as we can.

Mr. WILSON.* Mr. President, I am quite anxious for the vote, and on this as on all pressing occasions I regret to consume precious moments, but I cannot permit the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] to pass unnoticed. I remind that Senator in the outset that this nation has been engaged in a mighty contest of ideas, a bloody struggle, in which all the passions of this people of the South and of the North have been aroused. That bloody struggle is ended, that contest of ideas is closed. Patriotism, humanity, and Christianity bid us of the North and of the South subdue, hush, and calm the passions engendered by the terrific conflicts through which we have passed, and to call the dews of blessing not the bolts of cursing down upon each other. We should remember the words of one of our own poets of freedom and humanity—

"Always he who most forgiveth,
In his brother is most just."

I will remind the Senator from Nevada, too, that it is an easy thing to appeal to the prejudices, passions, and hates of the people of the South or of the North. Never was a greater temptation to demagogism presented to popular leaders either of the North or of the South than now. It is an easy thing for a popular leader in the South to appeal to the passions, prejudices, and hates of that people whose fields have been blasted by war, whose wealth has been devoured, and whose sons and loved ones have fallen in a lost cause. It is an easy thing, too, for popular leaders in the North by appeals to arouse passions excited by the conflict of arms in the bosoms of men whose sons and brothers have sunk into bloody graves in defense of their periled country. Whatever the champions of the lost cause in the South may do, we of the North, whose cause is triumphant in the fields of war and of peace, should appeal not to the passions and prejudices and hatreds of the people, but to the heart and conscience and reason. Unreasonable passion may applaud violent appeals today, but unclouded reason will utter its voice of condemnation to-morrow.

The honorable Senator from Nevada is pleased to tell me that I am anxious to welcome rebels here. I do not propose to welcome rebels here; but I do desire to welcome tried and true men of the South, the representatives of the seven hundred thousand enfranchised black men, the ever loyal white men of the South, and the men compromised by the rebellion whose affections are again given to their native land, and who would now peril their lives for the unity of the Republic and the triumph of the old flag. I believe that the enfranchised black men of the rebel States, the men who have ever been loyal, and the men reluctantly compromised by the rebellion, who are for their country, and many fiery, generous, deluded young men of the South who have seen their political illusions vanish in the smoke of lost battle-fields, can immediately take the direction and control of these rebel States. I believe these States must pass into the hands of patriotic men who comprehend in their affections the whole country, of liberty-loving men who believe in the sublime creed of human equality. I believe these States will soon pass into the hands of radical and progressive men who are true to country, true to the equal rights of man, true to the laws of human development and progress. I would facilitate that great work; I would welcome these men into these Chambers with heart and hand. Does the Senator from Nevada wish to keep such men out of these Chambers?

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts one question, and that is whether men who feel enough interest in the subject-matter of this election to register their names as voters will not feel enough interest in the election upon the constitution to cast their votes? Will not at least a majority of those who have taken the pains to get their names registered as voters vote upon the constitution?

Mr. WILSON. They may or they may not. There may be such general acquiescence in the constitutions formed by the conventions that they may think their ratification safe, and therefore it is not necessary to go to the polls. But, sir, I have a word to say to the Senator from Tennessee. When I was maintaining the same doctrine on the question of the admission of Tennessee last year that I am now maintaining, I had the same arguments to meet that I have to meet now. I have just as much confidence in the loyal men of these ten States as I had in the Senator from Tennessee and the loyal men of his State. It is a plain, clear case. The more united the people of a State are in favor of the constitution the fewer votes will be given for its ratification. Everybody will suppose it is going to pass as a matter of course, and therefore will not take the trouble to vote, and then they may wake up and find that because they have not brought out a majority of the registered voters the work is lost.

I have taken some little pains during the last two years to confer with southern men of every shade of opinion. When the loyal men of Tennessee came here I rejoiced to welcome them, to meet them, to consult with them about their State, and I took the earliest opportunity to declare on this floor that I was in favor of the admission of Tennessee. I received some severe rebukes for that expression of opinion here and elsewhere; but I put it upon the record as my opinion that the State of Tennessee would be the first State in this Union that would give negro suffrage, and she has led the van. We trusted Tennessee, and we have been vindicated by events; and we shall be vindicated by events in every one of these States. Sir, we have provided by law that rebels cannot come into these Chambers. In the constitutional amendment we have disqualified several thousand leading rebels from holding office in their States or in the nation. Yet the Senator from Nevada and some other Senators fear these rebel leaders, though they are tied hand and foot. Sir, I am not alarmed at it.

Sir, I would say nothing unkind to any of the Senators around me, but it does seem to me that they are disposed to put restrictions, not upon our enemies, but upon our friends. We have proposed to the ten rebel States the exact terms and conditions of reconstruction and restoration. Our friends in those States will take the lead in conforming their State constitutions to the terms and conditions we have imposed. The progress of events, the currents around us and about us, are carrying our ideas, our principles, and our policy onward to enduring triumph. In introducing this bill, supplemental to the act proposing terms and conditions, I simply proposed to provide the machinery by which these ideas and principles we maintain, and these terms and conditions we have laid down, shall be carried into effect. In putting these restrictions upon the ratification of these constitutions which must embody our ideas and be in accordance with the conditions we have imposed we are putting burdens upon our own friends to carry. I disown and denounce this fatal policy.

Mr. FOWLER. I have a single remark to make. I think the Senator from Massachusetts entirely misunderstood my question. I certainly am not disposed to find fault with his position now or at any time. He has a right to take such a course as he thinks proper. I have no doubt that he is sincerely earnest and patriotic in his position; I know he is; but I am of the opinion that the persons who take the trouble to have themselves registered under this law will, a very large proportion of them at least, be sure to go to the polls for the purpose of accomplishing the object named in the law. On that subject, however, I may be mistaken, because it may possibly happen that there may be persons registered as voters who will not be disposed to carry out this measure in good faith. I am very well aware that in the State of Georgia especially many persons are earnestly endeavoring to carry out our bill in good faith, and that they are very earnestly and urgently opposed by two classes of persons, but particularly by the old rebel element, the members of which are unwilling to give up the positions they have already obtained. There will necessarily be a violent contest in every one of these States, and I believe those in favor of reconstruction will triumph in every one of the States, but most readily and surely in Georgia and Alabama. At the same time I am not of opinion that under such circumstances, particularly where the contest becomes very violent, any considerable number of the registered voters will remain away from the polls.

Now, if I understand the bill as interpreted by the Senator from Illinois, it amounts to precisely the same as the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] That amendment simply fixes definitely and specifically what the intention of the bill is. It makes that plain which without the amendment requires construction. I do not wish to throw anything in the way of this reorganization. I know very well that the persons in Georgia and Alabama to whom I have alluded are very earnest in their wishes that nothing shall be thrown in the way of the passage of such a bill as this at the present time by Congress, as they are earnestly endeavoring to execute the law already passed in the best of faith. If anything further be required, it may be throwing obstacles in their way which they cannot readily surmount.

Another thing is to be considered, that all the colored persons in the South will vote. A great deal of distrust is entertained in the minds of some persons in regard to how they will vote, because of their want of intelligence. Let me say that although they are not learned, although they have never enjoyed the advantages of education, they understand their rights and their position and the advantages they are to have under the Government far better than a great many here suppose they do. They are not by any means so ignorant as some persons believe they are. For myself, knowing very much of them, I am satisfied that they are better prepared to vote than many here seem to suppose. They are not going to be so easily deceived as some Senators imagine. I am sorry to see here already a disposition to distrust them. It was the same thing in reference to every effort that was made to induce them to act in favor of the Government of the United States during the war. They were distrusted when an appeal was made to them to take up arms. They have been distrusted under all circumstances, and they are now. Perhaps this necessarily happens under such circumstances; but I have not the slightest fear on the occasion. True, some of them will be deceived; some white men are deceived; some of them will vote wrong; many white men do the same thing; but as a general rule they will be able to vote almost if not altogether as intelligently and as honestly as the corresponding class of white persons.

Mr. NYE. I do not rise to say anything more upon the question before the Senate, but to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, to the suggestion he made that he proposes to put an end to this demagogism in the Republican party.

Mr. WILSON. I did not say that.

Mr. NYE. What did you say?

Mr. WILSON. What I said, if the Senator desires to know, was this: that there was a great temptation presented to members of the Republican party now to demagogue; and that was by continuing, now that the contest is over, the same kind of appeals to the feelings of the country that were made during the great struggle in which we were engaged, and which were proper then, but are not proper now. I think the time has gone by for appeals to passion or prejudice or anything of that kind; and that now, when the war is over, and we have carried all our ideas, we ought to soften the passions and prejudices that grew up in the war and try to bring together and harmonize all our countrymen, so as to carry forward and secure the cause of the country and of liberty and justice. That is what I said.

Mr. NYE. I understand now, from the short explanation the Senator has made, exactly what he meant, that he thought there was a temptation to demagogue. I pray, as all good men should, that he may not be tempted in that way. If the honorable Senator meant to say that the remarks I made were dictated by any spirit of demagogism he is entirely mistaken. I entertain no opinions upon the rebellion or with regard to the rebels that I have not heard him a thousand times express. I supposed he was right then, and my experience has convinced me that he was.

I simply suggested that my surprise was excited by this wonderful change in the honorable Senator. I have heard him talk loud and long here in regard to the rebellion and the rebels; and he burned it into my very soul that these rebels were extremely dangerous people to this country. I should like to know some time, if the Senator has leisure to explain, what has wrought this mighty change in his opinions of rebels. At the proper time I have no doubt he will explain; but I repeat that the remarks which I made were prompted by no spirit of demagogism. I owe a duty to the whole country, and as great a duty to the loyal men of this country as to the rebels. My duty and his duty is to see to it that this reconstruction is built upon a basis that the waves of coming rebellion cannot rock. That is the duty of the statesman to-day. The question of individuals, and his love for this one and that, is of no importance; all that dwindles down into nothing. But the work of the statesman to-day is to so build up the breaches that the guns of treachery cannot again affect them. When I make an honest endeavor to do that, I submit to the honorable Senator's own sense of propriety whether it is becoming in him to charge me, or any other man who does that, with a spirit of demagogism? Sir, the Republican party stands upon no spirit of demagogism. It was born of the necessities of the hour. It was a coming together of all elements that were in favor of the country, and they are cemented by loyal blood. I submit again that it ill becomes the Senator from Massachusetts to charge people who stand by the doctrines of the party of which he was born into public life of demagogism in this hour, that advises to caution in this great work of reconstruction, when the proposition before us simply requires that a majority of the voters registered should say whether they will adopt the constitution or not. If that be demagogism I share fully in that spirit.

Mr. WILSON. Yesterday I took occasion briefly to state my views, and the Senator from Nevada seized the occasion to impute to me a change of position. I took no new position yesterday; I have taken no new position to-day. When the broken battalions of the rebellion surrendered, when the conflict of arms ended, I sought to close the long struggle by securing equality of rights and privileges to all men of every color and race. I sought to lift men up, not to pull men down. I have ever been against the control of these States by men animated by the spirit of the rebellion. I have been and now am against admitting rebels into these Chambers; but it is not the question now of putting rebels in power here, or of continuing them in power in the rebel States. The question is, Shall our friends, now loyal to the country, men who are with us and of us, have an opportunity to change their State constitutions, to remove the rebels now in power from power in those States, and send men into these Chambers who will think, speak, and vote as we think, speak, and vote?

The honorable Senator reminds me that we have heretofore agreed in fighting these rebels. Surely I have no more sympathy for them now than I had when they were engaged in the contest. We do not believe in rebels nor in rebel control in the States or in the nation. Shall we then tie the hands of our friends there who seek an early opportunity to incorporate our ideas into their constitutions, accept the conditions we have imposed, and take the direction and control of their States hereafter? The honorable Senator from Nevada and those who agree with him fear our enemies and distrust our friends. I do not fear our enemies, and I have confidence in our friends. This is the difference between the honorable Senator from Nevada and myself.

The honorable Senator from Nevada deems it matter of reproach that now the bloody contest is over, the rebels beaten, and their cause lost forever, that I should not entertain and express toward my defeated and fallen countrymen of the South the same stern condemnation, the same sentiments of censure and reproach. They are not alien enemies; they are not of another lineage and language. They are our countrymen; these States must continue for ages to come to be a part of our common country, and these people, their children, and their children's children, must continue to be our countrymen. I do not consider it either generous, manly, or Christian to nourish or cherish or express feelings of wrath or hatred toward them. At this time, when these misguided and mistaken countrymen of ours have been conquered, when we have absolutely established our ideas, which must pervade and be incorporated into their systems of public policy, it seems to me to be a duty sanctioned by humanity and religion to heal the wounds of war. Sir, I have fought the battle for the country; I have fought this battle for the equal rights of man, not to pull down anybody nor to be the personal enemy of anybody on earth. That is my position now and it will be my position hereafter. Our words should not rekindle the prejudices, passions, and hatreds engendered by the bloody struggles of civil war, but our words should be fitted to the changed condition of affairs and the needs of our country.

Mr. DRAKE. What is the question now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] which is an amendment to the amendment moved by the committee.

Mr. DRAKE. If I understand that amendment, the effect of it will be to require in the ratification of the constitution of any of these States the vote of a majority of all the registered voters.

Mr. SUMNER. That is it.

Mr. DRAKE. I regret very much to be compelled to differ from the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts as to that requirement. I wish to state what the operation of it will be. I can state it in a very few explicit propositions, which I think will instantly make the whole matter apparent to the mind of every Senator.

Suppose that in any one of these States there are fifty thousand registered voters. A majority of that number is twenty-five thousand and one. Suppose that in fact in that number of fifty thousand the number in favor of the constitution should be twenty-six thousand and the number against it twenty-four thousand. When the election would come off there would be many registered voters on both sides who would not vote. Every one who has voted under a registration law knows that not by any means all the registered voters ever do vote. In illustration of this I would refer to the case of my own city last November, where in a registered vote of nearly twenty-five thousand eight hundred nearly five thousand, about one-fifth of the whole number, did not go to the polls. Then, assuming that under no circumstances can the whole number of registered voters ever be got to the polls, let us apply that view to the figures which I have taken now as an example. If only one thousand of the twenty-six thousand in favor of the constitution should stay away from the polls the constitution is defeated, though ten thousand of the opponents of the constitution should do the same, for every one of the ten thousand, though absent, is still counted as a part of the opposing vote to be overcome.

Now, sir, this is contrary to the universally recognized principle applicable to all elections, that those who fail to vote are to be regarded as acquiescing in the will of the majority of those who do vote. For this reason, I consider it more just to all concerned, and more likely to secure a full vote, to make the result depend upon the majority of those who vote. Then, if any one stays away, he does so with the knowledge that his vote is lost, and that he is to be considered as consenting to the will of the majority. I say that it will be more likely to secure a full vote, for then every man on each side will feel that the result may depend upon his single vote; whereas if the other rule applies the opponents of the constitution, in order to lull its advocates into security and lead them to stay away from the polls, may themselves stay away, knowing that thus staying away every one of them is counted against the constitution. It is for these reasons that I cannot concur with the distinguished mover of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Wade—9.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORTON obtained the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. I hope we shall continue until five o'clock, and—

Mr. JOHNSON. Take a recess.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And then determine whether we shall take a recess or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us take a recess now, if we are to take one at all.

Mr. SUMNER. We cannot get a vote tonight. There are a dozen amendments to be offered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why cannot we get a vote to-night? Certainly we can.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall not adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope the Senator from Michigan will withdraw the motion to allow me to offer a proposition.

Mr. HOWARD. I withdraw the motion momentarily to enable the Senator from Missouri to offer his proposition.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President—

Mr. MORTON. Who is entitled to the floor? The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Missouri before the motion to adjourn was made.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I insist on my motion of adjournment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish the Senator would allow me to say a word.

Mr. HOWARD. Not a word.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I hope the Senate will vote down the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Fowler, Howard, Nye, Ross, Sumner, and Yates—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Norton, Kiddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—8.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now wish to state to the Senate, as I have had charge of this bill, that if Senators will forbear making speeches upon questions which I am sure the Senate will understand when they are proposed, and nobody's vote is changed by them, we can pass this bill or dispose of it in an hour. It is storming out; it is Saturday night; and my judgment is we had better take no recess, but hold on to the bill and finish it. Now, I do appeal to the friends of the bill not to make speeches in reference to it. If those who are opposed to it are determined to take up time, that we cannot help; but I do hope that the friends of the measure, if they have amendments even to propose, will not make speeches upon them. I trust we may go on with the bill and vote upon the amendments as they are offered, and dispose of it this evening.

Mr. MORTON. I am a friend of the bill, and I desire to offer an amendment, which I do not propose to discuss, simply remarking that I believe the amendment we have just voted down was entirely immaterial; that the bill means just the same thing now that it would have done if that amendment had been adopted, and that upon that point the Senator from Illinois was right. The amendment that I offer is in section four, line three, after the word "specified" to insert "cast at said election;" so that the section will read:

That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, the president of the convention, &c.

I move the adoption of that amendment, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether perhaps it might not be more in exact keeping with the language of that section in the previous line to phrase the amendment, as he proposes now, by the use of the words "given upon the question of its ratification?" If the Senator thinks that there is any more uniformity in the language in that style it is at his service.

Mr. MORTON. I am not at all choice about the language. It means just the same thing. The votes "cast at said election," and the election is for ratification.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member read the section as it will stand if amended?

Mr. MORTON. I will read the section as it will stand as I propose to amend it:

That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, &c.

My amendment is to insert the words "cast at said election;" and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senator from Indiana to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. The Senate by a vote has decided in favor of this principle.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; and you said you did not think it necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I said I did not think it necessary, but I voted that way to make it certain. I think we can carry the amendment without having the yeas and nays. I am for the amendment; that is, I am in favor of that principle. My other vote was given in order to make the meaning distinct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HOWARD. It seems to me that that amendment changes the purpose of the bill at the present time. As the bill now stands it requires a majority of the registered voters to ratify the constitution; and it is now proposed that that constitution may be ratified by a minority of the same voters. It may be ratified by a minority in this way: suppose that simply a majority of the registered voters of a rebel State attend the polls and vote on this question, and only a majority of that number ratify the constitution; the constitution, then, is not the work of the majority of the people of the State, but of a minority; and the governments which you thus propose to establish are to rest upon the basis, not of the consent of a majority of the people, but of a minority.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to make a suggestion to him at that point?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRAKE. The universal rule is that those that do not go to the election and vote are counted with the majority, are considered as acquiescing in the will of the majority.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator undertake to say that that is a principle of law or practice or usage?

Mr. DRAKE. Undoubtedly a principle of law, undoubtedly a principle of practice, undoubtedly a principle of usage as is practiced here in this Senate Chamber every day. When a question is put, and no person says yes or no, all are considered as acquiescing therein.

Mr. HOWARD. It is a principle of law, I agree, in the elections of corporations; but I am not aware that there is any principle of law that goes further than that. We are here, sir, constructing the fundamental governments for new States which are to participate in the affairs of the Government of the Union. We are laying down the fundamental principles upon which these new State governments are to rest. Now, sir, as I have said before, I am opposed to the establishment of State governments in the rebel States unless it is perfectly clear that the assent of a majority of the voting population has been given upon the great question of organizing State governments and returning to the Union. I wish to see the fact appear affirmatively that the majority of the voting people are in favor of the establishment of State governments and coming back into the Union; and I am not content to leave it upon the mere possibility that there may be a majority in favor of it, and the mere possibility that it may rest upon the consent of only a minority of the people. I wish, in other words, to base these new governments upon the principle that a majority of the voting population demand them, or at least consent to them, and not leave that great question to any other contingency.

It may turn out that in some of these States to be reconstructed under this bill none, or but very few, except negroes, will vote upon the question, or register even. There is nothing compulsory in the act requiring persons to register their names. No man is registered unless he signs the oath inserted in the bill. Suppose that three fourths or eight tenths or nine tenths of the white population in some of the rebel States should see fit to refuse to register their names or have anything to do with this question at all. Such an event is not impossible. It will then happen that these newly-reconstructed governments depend almost solely upon the votes of negroes. Then, sir, we should see the halcyon days which present themselves so charmingly to the vision of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] who has spoken so much on this subject. Instead of having governments in which white men participate, we may have governments in which only negroes participate; the white population in the mean time standing entirely aloof from them. Is this desirable? Is even the Senator from Massachusetts, who has rather slipperily, he will allow me to say, spoken of demagogism, and imputed it to persons who are not so swift as he to admit these new States, is even he content with the prospect which now stares him in the face under this amendment, of the establishment of purely negro governments in the South? And yet, because some of us on this side of the Chamber show a little hesitation and circumspection in this regard, he warns us against the temptation to demagogism, which is presented in the peculiar state of things at the South. What sort of ism is that which would tolerate the establishment of a government in even a rebel State founded solely upon negro votes and negro agency? Is that demagogism? And still the Senator from Massachusetts cannot fail to see that under this bill, if it shall be amended as he has proposed, the thing is possible; not only possible, but I apprehend in some cases very probable. I wish to guard against such a contingency. I am not quite demagogue enough to desire to see a purely negro government established, even in the rebel States, to the exclusion of white men.

Mr. MORTON. Before the vote is taken I want to say just one word. This is simply a question whether the stay-at-homes, political sluggards, sullen rebels, men who never take any interest in an election, and never go to an election, can defeat the work of reconstruction, defeat the will of the majority who do go to an election and take an interest in reconstruction and want the work to go forward. That is the whole question.

Mr. HOWARD. If that is the whole question, as the honorable Senator from Indiana says, I draw from it this inference, and it is an inference in which I shall hope to have even his concurrence: that if it be not the wish of a majority of the people of the rebel States to come back into the Union under this bill, I desire to see them stay out. I am not ready to welcome a political community, in the shape of a recently rebel State, back into Congress by its representatives, the majority of whose people are opposed to coming back into the Union.

Mr. HOWE. Suppose they should stay at home and not vote at all?

Mr. HOWARD. In case they stayed at home, as the honorable Senator from Wisconsin says, and we could not get the expression of a majority in favor of that measure, I should say stay at home still, and stay out of the Union. I am not in such hot haste as to hurry these States back into the Union when there is a majority of their people opposed to it.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very sorry to prolong this debate; but yet I want to do so long enough to express my dissent as earnestly as I can from the idea which seems to prevail here, that we are under the necessity of disregarding safeguards and proprieties in order to bring in Representatives and insure representation to these States a little sooner than it might otherwise be done. Sir, the philanthropy of this age has been caricatured in the case of somebody who proposed to send a fine-tooth comb and a moral tract to the children of Timbuctoo; and in my judgment the caricature is no greater than it is in the case of those who propose to cure every evil that prevails in the South by giving representation in Congress a little sooner to these men. We appropriated the other day $1,000,000 to feed the starving in northern Georgia and elsewhere in the South. I should like to know whether any one of the people for whom that appropriation was made would have been less cold or hungry or naked or thirsty if they had had men sitting in this House and the other for the last six months to make speeches or vote as the representatives of Georgia and these other States?

Now, sir, without dilating upon this, I deny, for one, that time is anything like so important as manner in what is called the reconstruction of these States; and that I need not be betrayed into any lengthy dissertation on this point, let me merely suggest to the Senate one case that may very likely arise. Take the case of Texas. I believe there are—I was about to give the area in square miles, but it is of no importance—enough to make five or six of the largest States to which we used to be accustomed—one hundred and eighty thousand square miles I thought it was, and a friend by my side [Mr. HENDERSON] agrees with me—destitute of railroads and facilities of locomotion, sparsely peopled, and put now under the command of an officer known to be radical, if I may use the phraseology of this day. Suppose a constitution is proposed there. The loyal people and the disloyal, so far as they are permitted by this bill, have a fair opportunity, but everybody understanding that, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] said, the election is pro forma, that it is of no consequence whether more or less go out, a constitution comes here from there ratified by a small number of people; a minority so small as to be contemptible as evidence of the popular wish in that State. Then an outcry is raised, as it will be, from Maine to California, that what was done in the case of a Territory, in the Administration of Mr. Buchanan, is to be repeated here, and that by the bayonet we are forcing upon an unwilling people a minority government. Is it worth while, sir? Why? The Senator from Maryland said that the negroes might be prevented by their masters from going to the election. Accepting such a possibility as that, I submit to him that it is the reason of all others why we should say to these masters in advance that a sine qua non of their restoration is, that they release from duress those negroes, if they possess the power to exert it, and allow them to go to the polls that a majority may vote.

But, sir, if it be true that they can detain from the polls a large body of the voting population, are we in advance to connive at the idea that a minority of one hundred or two hundred men in the State of South Carolina can manage in the first place the election which is to control the question whether a convention shall be held or not, and that then that same few hundred men can consummate the act of that convention, and fix as long as it shall endure the status of the people of that State as a member of the Union?

Mr. President, I have listened with great instruction to this debate. I have failed entirely to discover where the House of Representatives made its blunder, when, by a decided majority, the question being put and discussed, it insisted that, whatever else this bill should contain, it should not omit to require that a majority of that fraction of the people whose names are to be borne upon the registry shall assent to a restoration of representation. We all know that of the number of persons whom it is intended shall be registered, by no means the whole in any State will obtain registration. We know that in most of the States a very large per cent. will not. And now the idea seems monstrous to me that we are by the use of military agency to bring into relations with this Union any State in which, taking all sorts and conditions, black and white, loyal and disloyal, you cannot, even at the end of all these proceedings, obtain the consent of a majority of the registered people. Why, sir, the cry has been throughout the country by those opposed to the majority in this Chamber that we were denying the right of representation to men who were anxious and clamorous to come in; and now, forsooth, we are told, having added to those men the whole body of blacks in the South, the white loyalists belonging already to the voting population, that it is not safe for us, that it is not right for us to require that a bare majority shall concur in asking restoration.

Sir, my belief is, and I rose for the purpose of stating it, that we part with the sheet-anchor upon which this whole question depends; that we come to a "lame and impotent conclusion" in the legislative struggle in which we have been engaged for the last year, when we put in the hands of a minority, no matter how small, in every State, in the first place to pass conclusively upon the question whether a convention shall be called or not, and secondly, upon the question whether the will of that convention, as embodied in the organic law, shall become irreversible law as to the whole community which they profess to represent.

I hope, sir, for one, that this amendment will fail; and that if the language of the bill does not mean now, as the Senator from Maryland seems to think it does not, that a majority of the registered voters shall be required, some language will be substituted which will mean either that at the preliminary election to test the question of calling a convention, or else at the ultimate election to test the question of ratifying its proceedings, we shall have the outspoken assent of at least a naked majority of those whose names are borne upon the registration.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether the bill provides that every man shall be registered? Can he not stay away?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly he can stay away, and I derive strength to my argument from that fact. If we had a provision here by which all the men in a State entitled to registration were certain to receive it, it would give strength to the argument that a majority of all those ought not to be required in the vote adopting the constitution. But we are taking now the chances of a majority of only a fraction of the people; and so I have been arguing all the time. I borrow the illustration of the Senator from Michigan. Suppose in some State—and it is no forced supposition—a large number of people, of whites, who, although disloyal, are not technically excluded by the constitutional amendment, fail to have their names registered; suppose they look with an averted face upon all this proceeding; that they turn away in disdain, as they have done from other propositions. The registry is to show only the residue of the people entitled to registration. And now we are asked to give up the safeguard that we have in requiring a majority even of that residue. I protest for that reason among others, and I say it is one of the strong reasons which enter into this argument.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know whether it is in order to argue in favor of a measure on this floor that it has been passed by the House of Representatives. This body has an equal right to pass upon the question without having the action of the House thrown into our faces as an argument why we should follow suit.

Now, sir, whence comes this remarkable tenderness for the rights of men who are too lazy, too indifferent, or too hostile to attend an election? It seems to me to consort very strangely with the action of this body in having recently imposed a military government on these States all at once to become so remarkably tender in regard to the rights of the stay-at-homes, of the indifferent, and of the hostile, as to allow them to check the whole progress of reconstruction.

I will take the case of Texas as the Senator puts it. Suppose that the constitution should be ratified only by a small minority even of the State of Texas. Still those who felt interest enough in the work of reconstruction went and voted, took part in the election. The rest from some cause stayed at home. Some were sullen; some were hostile; and there is a body of men in every State who never go to an election, who feel indifferent, and are willing that others shall act for them. In all of your large cities there is a large body of business men who ordinarily take no part in the elections and are willing to let others decide for them. Some feel themselves above what they call the business of politics. Others think they are too dignified to take part in it. Now, sir, suppose that we allow the stay-at-homes and the indifferents to vote a constitution down by simply staying at home in the State of Texas; I ask the gentleman what is he going to do about it? This bill makes no provision for taking a subsequent vote. It makes no provision for a second convention. No further action can be taken without further legislation on that subject; and the work of reconstruction comes to a dead halt because there is a small balance of power that stays at home; that will neither do one thing or another. Sir, if we are in earnest in this work of reconstruction, if we mean to restore this Union, I ask that we shall not voluntarily put into the power of ten or twenty thousand men to defeat the whole work by simply staying at home.

Take the case put by the Senator from Michigan. If the white men will stay at home; if they will fold their arms, and are too dignified or too venomous to vote, I say let the negroes vote for them; they deserve to be governed by the negroes. If they have the power to govern themselves by voting and thus to deprive the negroes of the power, and shall voluntarily refuse to exercise it, I do not want the Senator from Michigan to come here and make appeals for those men. Let them take the consequences.

Sir, I am in earnest about this work of reconstruction. I want it to go forward; and as I am a true Republican, and I believe the salvation of this country depends upon the maintenance of that party in power, I am in favor of speedy and successful reconstruction for the preservation and the continued power of the Republican party.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not propose to detain the Senate but for a moment. Let us illustrate the principles of the honorable Senator from Indiana, to carry them out in practice, and see to what results they may lead. Take a single rebel State. Suppose its voting population is three hundred thousand, for the sake of illustration—two hundred thousand whites and one hundred thousand blacks. A registration is ordered by the military commandant in pursuance of the bill we have before us. The two hundred thousand white voters refuse to register their names, as they have the right to do. They do not see fit to participate in the proceeding. They dislike the project in toto. They are unwilling to reconstruct their State governments or to come back into the Union as a State, or to have anything whatever to do with a transaction that is intended to unite them again with the Government of the United States; and they therefore stay at home. They hate the Government of the United States, and they hate equally the black population to whom the appeal is also made. Notwithstanding this state of things the one hundred thousand black voters register their names, enter into an election, and adopt a constitution for that State. Does that constitution rest upon the will of the majority or upon the will of a minority? Clearly upon the will of the minority, and that minority a black population. How long, let me ask the Senator from Indiana, would a State government thus constructed endure? How is it to be maintained against the contemptuous opposition of the majority? Is it to be maintained by the intelligence and the superior patriotism of the black population against the persevering opposition, intrigues, and hatred of the white population? No, sir. It is to be maintained only by the bayonet and the sword. And, sir, I tell you, as I told you here two years ago, that such an ephemeral government, depending solely upon a minority, cannot sustain itself and cannot be sustained but by means of military force, and is but the merest idle and ridiculous mockery, a disgrace to the nation, and to the very name of republicanism.

Now, that such a state of things may possibly exist—

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask the Senator whether the people who refuse to register and refuse to go to an election and vote do not thereby fairly give their assent that the others who do go may speak and act for them?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; in a political proceeding of this kind, and after a rebellion in which the whole white population has been engaged, such an assumption cannot be safely acted upon.

Sir, go on with your government; establish your Legislature. Who are to be members? Black men. They may be honest men, and probably would be as honest as white men; but in the general very uninformed and ignorant men. Who are to carry on the business of their courts of justice? Black men; many of them ignorant; all of them more in need of protection than entitled to the administration of public affairs. Is it supposed that such a state of things can exist in this country? I tell you, sir, it is vain to expect peace and tranquillity under such an ephemeral, farcical government as that would be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS.]

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—10.

* So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to amend by adding after the words that have been just inserted these words:

At least three fifths of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification.

It will be observed by the Senate that this question does not raise any consideration touching those citizens of these States who are not registered. If they do not choose to be registered; if they do not choose to take the oath which we prescribe, they are left out as slugs, as stated by the Senator from Indiana, who are not entitled to any political rights at all. It is their own non-action that excludes them. This bill only operates, whichever way we may fix the majority, upon those who take the oath and are registered. Now, I think it right, under that state of circumstances, that in the important function of forming a constitution in these troubled and unsettled communities, there should at least come out and act upon the question in one way or the other three fifths of the registered voters. I do not require by this amendment, as it has been proposed before, that any majority of all the registered voters should vote in a particular direction for it; but my amendment only requires that there should come out and vote upon the question something more than a simple majority of those citizens who have taken the oath and have been registered, so as to get attention to the subject, and get an expression of the public so far as to require at least three tenths of the registered voters to vote in favor of the particular constitution. It will be observed that of the registered voters, as it now stands, only a majority of those voting are necessary to carry the constitution. Now, it may happen—

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member will permit me, I wish to ask—I am not sure that I heard his amendment—whether he requires a majority of three fifths?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; a majority of three fifths of the registered voters.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment requires that at least three fifths of all the registered voters shall vote one way or the other. The effect of that is only to require that one more than three tenths of the registered voters shall vote for the constitution. It seems to me that is reducing the political quorum low enough.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is very manifest that under the proposition of the Senator from Vermont all that is necessary to defeat the constitution is for those who are opposed to it not to go to the polls.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly. You require three fifths to adopt it. Two fifths may defeat it by staying away. I understand the Senator's proposition to be that three fifths of the registered voters must vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then if three fifths do not vote the constitution is defeated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Therefore you put it in the power of two fifths by staying away from the polls to defeat the constitution? I hope such a proposition as that will not be adopted. Two fifths of the registered voters by staying at home can defeat the constitution under this proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. My own impression is that the Senator from Vermont is substantially right in his proposition; but I would have said "a majority" instead of "three fifths." I do not look on this matter precisely in the light that others do. There is no doubt that people who will take the trouble to have their names registered, to file the oath, to go through all this machinery, in order to get the right to vote, will, three fifths of them at least, vote for or against the constitution on the question of its adoption. The very fact that a man is willing to subscribe an oath such as we require shows that he takes an interest in the subject-matter of the election, and desires to participate in forming this new government. No man will take the oath prescribed by the first section of this bill and have his name registered on the roll unless he intends to participate in forming and framing the constitution. The amendment now offered simply requires that three fifths of the registered voters shall take part in the election. I think it is wise for us, as Republicans, to require this.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio one question, with his permission.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I ask if under this amendment two fifths, by staying away, cannot defeat the constitution, when if they went to the polls and voted they would be beaten?

Mr. SHERMAN. What will be the result of that? The result will be that they will remain under military rule. They desire to relieve themselves from that. The people who intend to participate in this movement are those who are earnestly desirous to come back into the embrace of this Government, to be restored to representation, to have their business restored, to have their property protected, to have the various functions of a State government carried on in their midst. If a majority of the people stay away, refuse to assent to any constitution formed by their delegates, let them stay out. I would not give them the advantage of saying that they were forced back into the Union against their will. If a reasonable portion of them will not participate in this movement let them stay where they are, under military government.

I think this is a wise limitation. I have voted with the Senator from Indiana that a majority of all the registered voters ought not to be required, on the ground that there are a great many people who are indifferent, and many of the rebels themselves will stay away from voting, and probably will not take the trouble to qualify themselves for voting; but of those who are qualified to vote I have no doubt that three fifths will participate in the election on the question of the ratification of the Constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio if it is possible that it is a right proposition that two fifths by staying away from the polls can defeat a constitution which they could not defeat by voting, every one of them against it? You will teach men to stay away; that is the whole effect of the proposition. It is an encouragement for them not to come to the election.

Mr. SHERMAN. My answer is that there is no probability of such a result, because every man who will take the trouble to register his name and take the oath prescribed will probably vote for or against the constitution; or at least the great body of them will. Some few may not; but we have already provided for a reasonable margin; and now it seems to me that to require a majority of three fifths is not unreasonable. If these people are going to lay back in their position of quiet rebellion and resist all the movements we are now providing for them, all this machinery that we are now proposing to employ for their advantage, let them stay there, and stay there forever if they will.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is to become of those who are loyal and want to come back?

Mr. SHERMAN. They will be protected by the Government of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose there are fifty thousand registered voters in a State, thirty thousand of whom are in favor of the constitution and the remaining twenty thousand opposed to it. If those twenty thousand go to the polls they will be voted down, but if they stay away from the polls they defeat the constitution under this amendment by simply staying away, there not being three fifths at the polls.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have in my hands a letter from a man I used to know formerly, a prominent member of Congress from Virginia, who became a rebel and went into the war. He writes to me in regard to this very question, and makes the same objections that have been urged here so strongly. He says that there are probably one hundred and fifty thousand people in Virginia entitled to vote under the reconstruction act, and then he says that probably half the negroes will, at the first election at least, not be sufficiently informed of their rights or not feel sufficiently the importance of voting to have themselves registered and enrolled to vote. He therefore supposes that a considerable number of negroes will not vote of their own motion, either from indifference or from some other cause. Then he says that an equal number of proud rebels, men who are not willing to acquiesce in the present condition of things, will not take the trouble to vote, and some will be excluded by the terms of the constitutional amendment, so that the probability is that not more than one half or three fifths of the whole voting population will be registered. I think it probable myself that not more than a majority of the voting population in any of the southern States will be registered. Now, we propose that if they hold a convention, that convention shall first proceed to say whether they intend to come into the Union, and then if they say so the convention is to form a constitution and it is to be submitted to the popular vote. It seems to me that as the delegates who vote for making a constitution will probably represent but a minority of their people, we ought to require at least a majority of that minority to participate in this Government, or else they ought to stand where they now are, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

I think, therefore, that this is not an unreasonable provision, and I hope Senators on all sides will take it as a kind of compromise between these opposing ideas, the one demanding a majority of all the registered voters, and the other simply a majority of those who choose to vote. I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Vermont; I think it is right.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Illinois will pardon me, after he has made a speech about twice as long as I have on this question, if before the vote is taken I should reply to his proposition.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the amendment read. I want to get it in my mind, so that I can understand the argument.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be again read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed after the words "cast at said election," the amendment just adopted, to insert "at least three fifths of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, in reply to my friend from Illinois, and to the Senator from Indiana, I will say that there are various ways of putting things. The way that they have of putting it, that the effect of this is to allow two fifths to defeat the ratification of the constitution, is a very plausible way undoubtedly; but that only presents one single view of this question. When you look at it in the other point of view I think the proposition against their views would be still more startling than the one that they advocate; and that is, that without this amendment or some similar one a majority of one tenth of the people of any one of these States may control its destiny and may fix its government; and yet the Senators call that republicanism. If you do not make a provision of this description in the State of Virginia, if you suppose three thousand men voting on this question and sixteen hundred voting for the constitution and fourteen hundred against it, is it right that these sixteen hundred men should force a constitution upon the millions of the citizens of Virginia and the hundreds of thousands of its voters? The very committee of which the Senator from Illinois is chairman through him reported an amendment requiring an absolute majority of the whole number before such a constitution should be adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to put a question to the Senator. This principle is not a new one. In the organization of States out of Territories I think it has never been required that there should be a majority of the voters who should express their views upon the constitution or in the selection of delegates; and very recently a State has been admitted for which a population of eighty-eight thousand was claimed, and yet there were less than four thousand affirmative votes upon the constitution, clearly showing less than twenty thousand of the eighty-eight thousand in favor of the constitution; and I believe that the Senator from Vermont supported it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see the question. I believe that the Senator from Indiana did not support it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I have come on his ground and show some signs of political orthodoxy. I trust I shall receive the support of my distinguished friend from Indiana. It is time that in organized communities who are homogeneous, whose interests and views and opinions are in a social and in a political sense very generally or to a great degree the same, who have a common origin, a common language, a common education, a common social life, a common intermarriage, a common everything which enters into the composition of society, there is frequently no necessity for securities and safeguards of this description. But are we dealing with any such communities as these that I have described? Not by any means. We are dealing with communities a majority of whom, as it was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, now appear for the first time from the depths of social and political degradation, not having had the opportunities of societies or education or freedom, or even protection of law, that other men have had. Placed side by side with them is a large proportion of disloyal white men, educated, affluent, powerful. Society, therefore, is discordant instead of homogeneous; it is entirely a new problem. And when we are setting up governments which are to stand forever, and which will be, when once set up, beyond our control, there cannot be too much caution in the movements and steps we take in the direction of instituting these governments.

Now, all that my proposition requires is that of the registered persons, the loyal men who come forward and have their names registered and receive the oath that is to be administered to them, there shall act upon this question just a fraction more than a simple majority, and that a majority of that fraction shall control for all, so that any fraction over three tenths of all the registered voters adopt our constitution, after all. Is that asking too much in a republican government? The great State of New York, with an enlightened representation of Delegates and Senators, is not trusted in its Legislature to vote away the people's money unless three fifths of all the members are present and acting upon the question. Now, then, when we are to set up beyond any control of ours, beyond any undoing, remember, these great States once more, is it unwise, is it unfit, is it extreme, to require that more than three tenths of the loyal and registered population should be affirmatively in favor of the constitutional charter of liberty under which they are to act? That is the question; and that being the question, I am content to have the Senate pass upon it.

Mr. CAMERON, (at ten minutes before six o'clock p. m.) Mr. President, it is getting late on Saturday evening, and it seems to me that there is no hurry about this bill. It is a very important one, and should be deliberately and carefully considered. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn, so that we may rest over Sunday, and bring our minds here on Monday morning in a condition to pass the bill without unnecessary debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. I trust the Senate will stay and finish the bill.

The question being put, the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are several executive messages on the table that should be disposed of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Edmunds, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, and Wade—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Williams, and Yates—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I now move the amendment which I before suggested—

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me, I desire on this very point to propose the amendment first voted down, simply changing it from three fifths to a majority. I want to get a vote on it in that shape.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move the amendment which has just been voted down, changing it by striking out "three fifths" and inserting "one half." This amendment is to insert the words "at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, I desire to say a word. It does seem to me very singular that we should devise means here to defeat any formation of a government. Now, what is to be done to defeat the constitution under this proposition? Simply for all the rebels to go and get registered and then keep away from the polls themselves and keep everybody else away. I was willing to make this bill specific, as the House had it, and require a majority of the registered voters. I understood the bill from the Judiciary Committee to mean that; but the Senate did not so understand it, and voted against making it specific that way. I think it had better mean something; we had better know what it does mean. I am satisfied to have a majority of those who vote on the question ratify the constitution, but I am not satisfied to have the rebels get registered and then by staying at home have the advantage of keeping away those who are for the constitution. This allows a minority to prevent the organization of a government, for there never was an election held where all were able to get to the polls. It makes a man's vote who stays at home count more than the vote of a man who goes to the polls and puts it into the ballot-box. I am unwilling to sanction any such principle. It gives the opposition the advantage of all the stay-at-homes, while those in favor of conforming to the law and organizing a State government must be well able to get to the polls and put in their ballots in order to count as much as those who are opposed to it and who stay away.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend from Illinois whether as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee he did not report this bill requiring a majority of all the registered voters to vote for the constitution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will answer the Senator that I did; but the Senator from Vermont is one of the very persons who said it did not mean that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not mean that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it did not mean that I wanted to make it specific; but we could not make it so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly. Therefore my friend from Illinois must have had a recent illumination if he now thinks that the amendment which I propose is going to destroy the efficiency of this bill, because on his own confession he has reported, after consideration in committee, a proposition which is a great deal stronger than the one which I now propose, because he required not only that a majority of all the registered voters should come to the polls, but he required that a majority should act affirmatively for the constitution; and, therefore, if there was one eighth of them who voted the other way on his proposition, although a majority of the whole number acted, the constitution would be lost. Now, all I require is, following at an humble distance my distinguished friend, that only a majority shall act, and that one more than a quarter of all the registered voters shall adopt this constitution. I am sure that my friend, having reported in favor of a proposition of that kind, ought to be willing to adopt one like this.

Mr. CONNESS. I feel liberal in this matter as between the two Senators, and am willing to concede that each of them is consistent; but the reason why I have voted on the propositions that had been before this body persistently in one way is this: that I believe, so to speak, all of our friends in the South, all the loyal men, black and white, who are in favor of this scheme of reconstruction, will be sure to be registered and will be sure to vote. Now, I think that they can be trusted with reconstruction. I am not willing to put it in the power of those who are against this scheme of reconstruction, who were for the rebellion, to prevent reconstruction. That is my reason.

Mr. TIPTON. I have just this to say: that the more this question is discussed the more I feel an interest in it, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] spoke the democratic truth when he said that such a rule as that now proposed, so subversive of the principle of democracy, would have kept a recent State out of this Union. That is true. You never required it of the people of a Territory. I represent a people who were permitted to come here in case they could show a majority in favor of a State organization; and I will not, therefore, under any circumstances or anywhere cast a vote by which some other constituency shall not come here by a single one of a majority. That is my democracy on a question of this kind. So far as it is said that men will stay away and not trammel this operation because as rebels they will not take the oath, that is not true in fact. So far as they demoralized all over the South that I understand their pulpit taught it to be a high Christian virtue everywhere that men should perjure themselves for the benefit of the confederacy; and when Mr. Lincoln's amnesty proclamation came within the lines they flocked to our headquarters everywhere and took the amnesty oath, and if they were taken the next day they were found with the amnesty oath in their pockets when they had been shot down with arms in their hands. I say that I am not here to legislate for the rebels of the South only incidentally as I am compelled to do so when I come here to legislate for the loyal men of the South. I have made my position clear and emphatic in Nebraska upon this question. I told my constituents there that if I came here I cared not to counsel with the loyal men of the North in regard to how I should cast my votes on a question of this kind, but I would come here to ask the loyal men of the South, and then I would vote to enfranchise the loyal men of the South, be he white or black, if necessary for the good of loyalty in the South, and that I would vote to enfranchise the African women of the South if necessary to protect the white and black loyalty of the South; and I have nothing to take back upon that subject of this kind.

I must declare that a superficial observer during the discussion this day would suppose our first business here was to legislate in behalf of rebels, forsooth! Sir, we went to a loyal minority when we went with arms in our hands to release them; and I propose to go to that loyal minority now, and a minority perhaps that would be willing to give as good attention to the poor remarks I should make as many of the Senators here just at this present speaking. I go to that loyal minority and I say a majority of them, so help me God, shall control the destiny of their States and the destiny of the South and the destiny of the rebels of the South. For four years we have done without the representatives of disloyalty in this Chamber; for four years more we can do without the aid of the disloyal in authorizing States at the South; and loyal white men and loyal black men who have lately sustained the flag of the country will come to our aid in this matter. I am not willing that the disloyal, by any classification, by any mathematical calculation, shall be permitted to stay at home and assist in defeating the will of the loyal men of the North. This may be called spurious morality and philanthropy. I would simply suggest for the benefit of the Senator from the State of New York [Mr. CONKLING] that when he goes on a peddling mission with his fine-tooth combs he may find as much necessity for them in the purloins of the city of New York as in the humblest freedman's cabin in the whole State of South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Williams, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Morton, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I now offer the amendment that I indicated before; in the first section of the amendment of the committee to strike out all after the word "said" at the commencement of the thirteenth line to the end, being the provision as to the oath, and in lieu thereof to insert—

And the registering officers appointed for the purpose aforesaid shall be authorized to administer oaths or affirmations to persons who shall desire to be registered, and examine them touching their electoral qualifications under this act and under the act to which this is a supplement.

The necessity of this amendment must be apparent in order to have anything like a complete and perfect registry instead of a rigid form of oath to be taken by every person who applies for electoral privileges under this law. I provide that these officers may administer all necessary oaths for the purpose of testing the legal qualifications of applicants to be placed upon the registry list. The bill makes no provision of that kind; it does not arm the officer with any authority to ascertain under oath the age of a person or any other qualification required by law. Under this amendment these officers could go on and make a registry which would be in exact conformity with the law. We avoid the questions discussed before under this clause.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The machinery which is to control the registrations and the proceedings of the election is not attempted to be put into this bill. We have not got up an election bill here, but simply a mode of inaugurating the election, leaving it to the commanding general to adopt the machinery. Probably he will adopt that which is in force in most of the States to carry out the law. We cannot undertake here to get up a perfect election bill. This is not designed for any such purpose, I would say to the Senator of Pennsylvania; but it is supposed that the commanding general there will prescribe such regulations either of his own conception or will adopt those already in use in the States where he is in command as will carry out the bill. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am not going to discuss this subject; but as a matter of course these commanding generals cannot pass laws especially for the administration of oaths. They can make rules and regulations, but they cannot enact of their own motion, at their own pleasure, a code for the administration of oaths and for the punishment of persons who commit perjury.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CORBETT. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after the word "district" at the end of the tenth line of the first section the words:

Of which thirty days' notice previous to registration shall be kept posted in at least two places in each township or precinct, designating the places of registry; and books of registry shall be kept open at least thirty days next preceding the day of election in at least one township or precinct in each county or parish.

I offer this amendment in order to make this provision more distinct. It seems to me that under the section as it stands it is left entirely to the commanding general to give or not to give proper notice, as he may choose. If the commanding general who happens to be in command of any department desires that there should not be a registration of the proper number of votes he may neglect to take the proper precautions to have the people come out and register themselves. I have great confidence in the generals selected to command these districts, and in their subordinates, that they will probably do what is proper; but in order to prevent any mistake in this matter I offer this amendment, not with a desire to create any discussion or delay the passage of the bill, but to make this point specific, so as to prevent trouble hereafter. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MORTON. This bill now, as I understand it, contains no requirement that public notice shall be given of the registration. Every registry law in every State requires that notice shall be given of the opening of the books for registration and notice of the election. It is required by the laws of every State, so that every person may be informed by publication in the newspapers or by advertisements posted up in public places. It is important that the utmost notoriety should be given because we know that there is a large ignorant population in this country, and this registration might be carried on in such a way that one half of that people would be entirely uninformed about it unless there be some positive requirement on that subject. We wish to get at the ignorant portion of the people who do not take the papers, who do not read; in other words, the colored people. There ought to be some provision giving them information as to the time and place when and where they can go and be registered. It should not be left to the discretion of the registering officer or of the commanding general. There should be a positive requirement of law on the subject.

Mr. CORBETT. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLE. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon to modify his amendment by inserting the word "public" before "places;" so as to read: "notice in at least two public places in each township," &c.

Mr. CORBETT. I accept that modification.

Mr. HOWARD. I am unable to see any objection to this amendment; and if there be any I should really be happy to hear it stated by some gentleman who is opposed to it. It is perfectly simple in its intention and purpose, and that is to give notice to all persons interested in the registration residing in the county or in the parish of the times and places at which they can register their names. The absence of this notification I regard as a very great defect in the bill. There will be thousands of persons who without such a notification will be in entire ignorance of the proceeding, and will be therefore deprived of the privilege of registering their names if they should be disposed to do so. I see no objection whatever to it, and hope it will be adopted.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, and Yates—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move a correction of phraseology in the seventeenth line of the first section by striking out the word "said" and inserting "the act entitled an."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is merely verbal, and I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This verbal alteration will be made, no objection being interposed. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary as it has been amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that when the bill is reported to the Senate we can have another vote upon any question. I shall wish to ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. CORBETT.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that when the bill shall have been reported to the Senate it will be in order to amend it in any particular.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is impossible to execute the bill with that amendment embodied in it, and I was taken by surprise at the vote of the Senate adopting it. I apprehend it did not receive consideration. It is utterly impossible to post up notice at two public places and keep the registry open for thirty days in every township throughout the South. You cannot find the men to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment will defeat the purpose of the bill. It provides that before the registration is commenced thirty days previous notice shall be kept posted in at least two public places in each township or precinct, designating the place of registry, and that the books of registry shall be kept open at least thirty days preceding the election in at least one township or precinct in each county or parish. Now, as I understand the bill, the commanding general after the registration is made has to make his apportionment. The registration is to be sent to him for that purpose, and he is to examine it and see that it is all right. Then he makes his apportionment, and makes the arrangements for ordering an election; but according to this amendment the registry books are to be kept open for thirty days before the election. It seems to me this demands an impossibility. The number of notices required is entirely too great for every township. The bill, I suppose, does not contemplate more than three or four places of election in a county; but it leaves that matter to the military commander.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senate that it would be utterly impracticable to find three persons of sufficient intelligence and learning in each township in all the southern States who could take the iron-clad oath, and keep this registry open for thirty days, nor would there be any sort of necessity for it. The amendment would render inoperative the whole bill. It cannot be carried out.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it be kept in the bill we must repeal the test oath.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You would have to repeal the test oath, or you could not find persons to execute the law. I have been told that it would be very difficult to find the persons in some of the counties even, and we were strongly appealed to by men from the South to amend the House bill in that respect, and strike out the clause which requires the registering officers to take what is known as the iron-clad oath; and in answer to that call we did change the House bill by leaving it to the commanding general to designate the number of places at which elections should be held. The House bill required elections to be held in each precinct, and these officers to be appointed in each; but to obviate the objection that persons could not be found to make this registration and preside at the election who could take the oath, we have left it to the commanding general to designate the number of places of voting, so that if it were necessary, if he could get along in no other way, he need have but a single place of voting in a county. Perhaps that would be sufficient in many cases. In some sparsely-settled counties of the South, where the territory is not too large, the people may all vote at the county seat. But the requirement of this amendment to have books of registry at two places in each township and precinct would render the bill utterly impracticable of execution in many of the States.

Mr. HOWARD. The registration, as provided for in this bill, precedes the election, for it is not until after the registration has been completed by the military commander that an election is authorized. The second section says, "that after the completion of the registration hereby provided for in any State," &c., "an election shall be held." Now, sir, I want to know how persons interested in this registration are to learn where they are to go to register their names and to take this oath? What provision does the bill make for giving this information, this notice which every man ought to receive under the bill? There is no provision in the bill for giving notice, and there may be thousands and thousands, black and white, in any county or parish, who are in utter ignorance of the mode and manner by which they can register their names, ignorant even of the fact that a registration is to be had. Is it not fair that persons should receive this notice? Is it not the practice in every State of this Union where there is a registration act to notify the people of the times and places when and where the board of registration is to sit in order to enable them to go and register their names? Will the Senator from Illinois launch his scheme of reconstruction in the manner suggested by this bill, without notice, without knowledge, a proceeding in which only a select few would happen to be informed of the nature of the proceeding? Is this the kind of reconstruction which he asks? Is he not content with the other provisions of the bill, that a minority shall serve as the basis of these new State governments, but is he seeking to conceal the proceedings from the voters?

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will give way, I think as this is a mere matter of detail it can be arranged satisfactorily to all parties.

Mr. HOWARD. All I want is reasonable notice.

Mr. SHERMAN. Notice is proper. I move to strike out all after the two first lines of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. The two first lines are all that is necessary, providing for notice, leaving the form and manner of the notice to be settled by the commanding general.

Mr. HOWARD. Perhaps that will be satisfactory.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose simply to leave in the amendment the words "of which thirty days' notice previous to registration shall be given by the commanding general."

Mr. HOWARD. Leaving the mode and extent of the notice to the commanding general?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; that is better. In some cases he can do it by advertisement where there are newspapers.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly that would be much better than the bill as it stands.

Mr. WILSON. I take it the voting places in the South are as clearly defined as they are anywhere else in the country.

Mr. HOWARD. But the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to say that this registration is not required to take place at a voting place in these States at all.

Mr. WILSON. I think I understand the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I question it.

Mr. WILSON. I have no controversy on that point; but I think I do, and I think my votes on this question show it, and I know that the Senator's votes do not show it in regard to him. The voting places in those States are clearly defined, and that commander who did not have the persons registering the voters visit every voting precinct and give proper notice would violate his duty, and if the registrars did not do that they would violate theirs. Their duty will be clear and plain to go to the places of voting to give the proper notice and to see to it that every person is registered if possible. After the registration is made it must be returned to the commander, and the commander, on the basis of registration, divides the State up into as many delegate districts as there are members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, basing the apportionment on the number of persons registered. After all this is done he must then give notice of not less than thirty days of an election to take place for delegates; so that it is impossible to comply with the latter clause of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon; but if that clause be left out I have no objection to the amendment, because notice of the fullest kind ought to be given; and further than that, the registrars ought to visit every voting precinct to see to it that the people are well notified and that they are properly registered. They will appear and vote unquestionably not by counties, but in their voting places in that part of the country, and they will have the officers there to register them. If this is not done, we are not to get the proper sense of the people.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Massachusetts, as it seems to me, confounds the proceeding known as the registration with the election itself.

Mr. WILSON. No, I do not.

Mr. HOWARD. I rather drew that inference from what the Senator said; but I understand him now, and he will allow me to go on. The first proceeding is the registration. The commandant is required before the 1st day of September, 1867, in each district defined by the act which we have just passed, to cause a registration to be made of the male citizens of the United States of the proper qualifications. Suppose we pass the bill to-day and it becomes a law: it thereupon immediately becomes the duty of the military commandant to commence this proceeding known as the registration in each of the counties and parishes. This registration must be completed before an election can be called.

Mr. WILSON. Before the 1st of September.

Mr. HOWARD. Not only by the 1st of September, but before an election can be called, for it is necessarily a preliminary preceding the election, as nobody can participate in the election who is not registered.

Section two says:

That after the completion of the registration hereby provided for in any State, at such time and places therein as the commanding general shall appoint or direct, of which at least thirty days' public notice shall be given, an election shall be held of delegates.

There must be notice of at least thirty days before the election takes place; and necessarily this space of time, thirty days, must intervene between the completion of the registration and the holding of the election. The registration may take place at any time after the passage of the bill before the 1st of September, and it will be the duty of the commandant to give the notice of the election. Why not, then, require him to give a notice of thirty days, or any other reasonable notice, of the registration? What I object to is to the concealing from the great mass of the people—I say concealing, because concealment is the result—that a registration is about to take place. I do not like this mode of doing things in the dark. Let us do it openly, and do not let us give even the rebels the excuse of saying that they had not been notified of the registration, as this in its present shape would furnish them.

Mr. WILSON. I must confess that I hardly see why it is necessary that the Senator should be talking about concealment. I am sure nobody here desires to conceal anything.

Mr. HOWARD. What I mean is the suppression of the fact by the non-appearance of formal official notice. That is what I mean by concealment, of course.

Mr. WILSON. I endeavored to make an explanation of the provisions of the bill, but the Senator did not seem satisfied with it, and so he restated precisely and exactly the position I had taken. Now, if this bill be what he says it is, how in the world can he vote for this amendment? This amendment not only requires notice, but says the registration shall be kept open till within thirty days of the time of voting. That is an utter impossibility. The registry must be closed, must go to the commandant, and the commandant must upon it apportion delegates and then call the convention. It is the latter part of the clause moved by the Senator from Oregon to which I objected, and which is contrary to the theory of the bill. The first part of the amendment requiring notice I do not object to. I am willing that thirty days' notice or forty days' notice shall be required, or any notice that is deemed proper to enable all concerned to know all about it; for it is of vital importance to those who want to organize these States by the patriotic and loyal efforts of all to have the black people receive abundant notice and have an opportunity to be registered, because the active, earnest, leading rebels will quickly find out when the registrar is around, and I want the men on the plantations, the black men, to find out; and therefore I am willing to adopt the first part of the amendment, but the latter part of it is in conflict with the bill, and I hope will be abandoned.

Mr. CORBETT. My object in offering the amendment was to require that in each voting precinct, whether it be a county or a parish or a township or other subdivision, public notice should be given so that all would have a chance to be registered. I wish to have the notice given in the usual places of voting, whether the voting precinct embraces a whole county or a township or some smaller subdivision, so that the fact that a registration is to be made may be brought to the knowledge of the colored people especially, so that they may know that they can register their names. There may possibly be a design on the part of the employers of the colored people in some cases to prevent the news reaching them that they will be entitled to have their names registered, and it is necessary to have public notice given and notices posted up so that the news may be circulated among all the people and all may understand what is being done. If these notices are stuck up in public places and torn down by interested parties I want them put up again. I want all to have sufficient notice so that they may register their names. If the negroes have holiday on Saturday, let them have a chance to register themselves on Saturday. It may be necessary in some cases to require the boards to sit in the evening, so as to give them a chance to register themselves then if they have no opportunity to do it during the day. The planters may try and keep them busy at work, so that they will not have a chance, even within thirty days, to leave the plantation for the purpose of registering their names. I want to provide against these contingencies; and lest a commander may not issue a proper notice, why is it not competent for us to insert in this bill a requirement that he shall give proper notice and that the notice shall be displayed at particular places? I propose to have the notice displayed in each voting precinct. In many cases a whole county or parish may constitute but one voting precinct. I think that covers the case.

I am opposed to striking out of the amendment what gentlemen seem to regard as unnecessary detail. I do not so esteem it. I think, with great deference to the committee, that it involves a fundamental principle. I do not like to insist upon a thing that is deemed improper by gentlemen older and more experienced than myself; but it strikes me that some such provision as I have proposed is necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER, (at six o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; we will vote it down.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the call.

The Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am exceedingly sorry that my friend from Oregon should have offered this amendment, or that the friends of the bill should have consented to allow any such amendment to go upon it. If I can get the attention of Senators, I wish to say that if you are going into detail to fix the mode of proceeding of your commanding general, you cannot finish this bill without rerefering it and getting up a general election law. It is not intended to do any such thing in this bill. We have left it to the commanding general to do, what? It shall be his duty to cause to be registered "the male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish in the State or States included in his district." He must take the steps to register all these male persons; and now you propose to say how much notice he shall give of where the persons shall go to register. You must leave this to the commanding general.

Well, but some one says, the commanding general may not do this fairly, he may not register the men. If you have got a commanding general that does not purpose to execute this law, you cannot execute it at all. Our whole legislation in regard to the South turns upon the carrying out of our law by the commanding general. The whole object of this bill is to set the thing in motion; and if you are going to permit amendments to be put upon the bill as to the detail of how much notice shall be given before a man shall be registered when are we to get through with it? It does not want any notice of that kind; let him be registered at any time. I do not care whether there is notice or not. It is the duty of the commanding general to register every male citizen in his county or district except those who are disfranchised by the act to which this is supplementary; and if he does not do it, he violates his duty, and we will hold him and the President responsible for it.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to ask whether it is the intention that the commanding general shall send his men around with a book to register these men all over the country?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is intended that he shall send his men to every house, if it is necessary, to register them. The commanding general is directed to make a registry of the voters; and I should presume that any man fit to be a commanding general would know the propriety of giving notice and urging these people to come in.

Mr. CORBETT. As I understood the gentleman some time ago, he said there could not be enough men in all the precincts to be gotten order to register these names. Now, if you have enough men to send around to register these names, why not enough for the other purpose?

Mr. TRUMBULL. There cannot be found in each township a sufficient number to carry out the Senator's amendment. There are twenty, perhaps forty, townships in some counties; and he would require books to be opened at two places in each township. That would require six persons in each township who could take the oath. Could you get a hundred persons in a county who could do that and who could attend to this business for thirty days? Besides, there is no necessity for it. That is the provision of the amendment to which I was replying. We want no provision of this kind in the bill; and if you are going to make amendments as to details, how much notice shall be given, and where the particular place of voting shall be, and the manner of contesting the election, the manner of challenging voters; if you mean to go into all these details you have got to get up a new bill entirely, and you cannot get it up in the Senate by one Senator offering one amendment and another another; you had better refer the bill to some committee to prepare a general election law. The Judiciary Committee undertook to do no such thing. This is a House bill, not prepared in the Senate. The Senate committee have reported, it is true, a substitute for it; but it is the House bill rewritten almost verbatim. There is very little change from the House bill; and I trust if we are to pass any bill at all, those who are in favor of the passage of the bill will vote against these amendments of detail, one detail requiring another. This amendment requires thirty days' notice before anybody shall be registered. It wants no notice at all before you register any one. It wants notice that the registering officers are about, just as notice is given that your revenue officers go about; and then let everybody come in and be registered at any time. If it is necessary, men must be sent into every locality, for it is the duty of the commanding general to cause these people to be registered, and if he does not do it, he does not perform his duty and what the law requires of him. He will find it his interest to give all the notice he can, to spread it abroad, and get the people to come in and be registered with facility. But if we undertake to put these details into the bill we cannot do it here in open Senate. Now, I do hope my friend from Oregon will not press his amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not understand that it is so particularly the duty of the military commandant to make this registration as the Senator from Illinois appears to do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is the language of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. He says this is the language of the bill. It is true, the bill says that the commanding general in each district "shall cause a registration to be made of the male citizens of the United States," &c. That is what the bill says. He is not to do it himself in person, and it is not to be expected. The bill casts upon him in reference to registration simply this duty, as expressed in section three of the bill:

That the commanding general of each district shall appoint as many boards of registration as may be necessary, consisting of three loyal officers or persons, to make and complete the registration.

So that, after all, the sole connection of the commanding general with the business of registration is that he appoints in each election district three loyal persons to make and complete the registration, and that is all the connection he has with it. Now, according to the Senator from Illinois, it is quite sufficient that the commanding general shall appoint three loyal persons in each county, if a county should happen to be an election district, or in any other description of election district that may happen to exist. He says, of course it is the incumbent duty of the general to see to it that this registration is completed; and it would seem that he intends to hold him responsible for any dereliction or failure in the completion of this registration of which he may not be in anywise guilty. The persons to perform this duty are to be appointed by him, and they and not he are responsible for it. Now, suppose he appoints three ignorant, inattentive, drunken, perhaps, careless men, who do not want any registration really to be taken; they stay at home, attend to their private business or their private amusements, and let the business of registration go; nobody is informed when or where his name can be entered upon the register, and no registration takes place in that district. Is this a compliance with the law? And because these three persons are charged with this duty the Senator holds it to be quite sufficient, and that no printed notice is requisite to carry the knowledge of the fact that there is to be a registration home to the business and bosoms of the persons who are interested in it. It seems to me this is leaving matters at loose ends; and now that we have it in hand, it is our duty to see to it that notice is fully and fairly given so that everybody interested in the matter may avail himself of the registration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no doubt that my friend from Michigan, who is utterly opposed to this bill, and has been from the beginning—

Mr. HOWARD. By what authority does the Senator from Illinois make that assertion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. From the course of action which the Senator has taken it is very manifest that he would throw any obstacle in the way of its passage which he properly could as a Senator here.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, that is an imputation which I deny; it is totally unfounded and unjustifiable. I have taken part in the discussion, and propose to do so still.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I judge of the Senator's designs by his votes and his speeches. No amendment, however objectionable it may be, which has been proposed, the tendency of which would be to defeat the bill, I think has failed to receive his vote; and I expect him to criticise and find fault with any provision that is in the bill, and to favor any matter of detail which is likely to embarrass the operation of the bill. I expect that from his course here hitherto; he is very consistent in his course, has been during the whole time this bill has been before us; and I expect him to follow it out. I have no doubts, however—I do not mean to say that of the Senator from Michigan—there are persons who do not want these States reconstructed and restored to their former positions in the Union, at any rate within any proximate time.

Now, sir, I do not propose to answer all the objections that are raised in detail. I abstained from saying anything when the Senator from Oregon offered this amendment originally, because it seemed to me so palpably inconsistent with carrying out the provisions of the bill that it would not receive the sanction of the Senate. I supposed that a majority of this Senate were in favor of the act of the last session of Congress; I supposed they were in favor of a bill to carry that into effect. If, however, I am mistaken in that, of course they will load the present proposition down with amendments improper, impossible of execution, will go into details about the time of notice and all those little things which will prevent action upon the bill. I had hoped we might get a vote to-night. I shall take no time in discussion further than when amendments are offered, if they are persisted in, stating what seems to me to be the objection to them if there is objection. I hope we may vote on the amendments with as great expedition as is consistent with a proper understanding of them.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not recognize the right of the Senator from Illinois to take me to task in this personal way at all. He has no right to impute to me a factious opposition to the progress of this bill through the Senate. It is very true that I have endeavored to amend the bill in various ways; but I have acted honestly and sincerely with a desire to perfect this bill, and make it conform to my own ideas of what is right and proper; and because my ideas upon this, the most important subject that has ever come before the Senate, do not happen to concur with his, because I happen to dissent from his views in respect to certain provisions of this bill, it does not become that Senator, let me say to him with all proper respect, to take me to task in this very imperious and schoolmasterly style. I do not recognize his authority, and I shall be very much obliged to him for the future if he will forbear to attempt to bring me to the stool of lecture in the manner he has assumed to do here. I have as much right, I take it, to discuss this question or any other question in the Senate as has the Senator from Illinois; and it is a little offensive, let me say to him, to be taunted with the unfounded taunt that I, and others here, judging from our conduct during this discussion, are opposed to all restoration of the States. Sir, I fling this unmanly imputation back into his teeth, and say to him that there is no Senator here more willing to enact a just and proper statute upon the subject of restitution of the rebel States than I am; but I will not be dragged by any Senator into the adoption of views or principles or provisions of law in which I have no confidence; and I am just vain enough to suppose that my own opinions are as sound upon this question as are those of the Senator from Illinois. I acknowledge no superior, and least of all do I acknowledge a dictator, here or elsewhere.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NYE. I desire to present the following amendment to come in at the place where the rejected one was proposed to be inserted:

The registration shall be completed twenty days previous to the day of voting, and at least three copies of the completed registry shall be posted in each voting precinct designated by the commanding general of the district.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill already provides that it must be completed more than thirty days before, so I suppose there is no objection in having it twenty.

Mr. NYE. Does it provide for posting?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It provides that no election can take place until after the registration is returned, and it requires at least thirty days previous notice of the election. So there must be more than thirty days' notice. It does not require the posting up of the registration.

Mr. NYE. I understood that provision of the bill, but that provision does not require the essential part, the posting up of notice.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say but a word about that as I promised to take but little time. This is another of those details that it is proposed to put into the bill; and I think if you undertake to amend the bill in that way in the Senate you will have a very incongruous bill: it will result in having to recommit it and having an election bill prepared. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. NYE. I have only one word to say on the subject. The great object of registering votes is to advise the people who are voters; and I venture the assertion that there is not a registry law in any State of this Union but what requires that the list of voters shall be posted a given time before the election. The object is that persons who are desirous of having a fair and honest vote may examine the registry and see whether any name upon it is a voter or not. In New York I think they require the notice to be posted ten days and prescribe the manner of posting it; in Michigan twelve days I think are required; and in every State where there is a registry law the requirements of posting the registry always follows of course; so that any one can go and see whether Mr. Nye has registered his vote as living at such a number and such a place, to inquire whether he lives there, and then can ascertain whether there is such a voter living at that place. The object here will be to see if men have registered their names as voters who come within any of the provisions that exclude them from voting; and the inhabitants of the place will know much better about it than the commanding general. I hope that that amendment will prevail so far as the posting of notice is concerned; at least I hope the Senator from Illinois will not object to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is certainly no objection to posting the notice. The Senator from Nevada will not understand me as opposed to that. I think that should be done.

Mr. NYE. Then let it pass.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The objection to the amendment is that we cannot undertake in this bill to go into all the details. If you do, in how many places are you to post up the notices of holding an election, what kind of notice must you give, and how is the election to be conducted, and who is to provide the ballot-boxes? Who is to do all these things? They are all to be done. We have not provided who is to furnish the ballot-boxes or how it is to be done. We have left this election to be conducted under the direction of the commanding general; and I say to my friend from Nevada I think it very proper that the list of voters should be published that everybody may see it. There are a great many things that he and I know would be very proper in conducting this election, not one of which is put into this bill. Does the Senator from Nevada mean or does the Senate mean that we shall make this bill perfect in regard to the machinery of the election or to undertake to provide it all? If the Senate come to that conclusion let it rerefer the bill at once, for there are forty such amendments that would have to be made to carry out that view. I oppose this amendment, not because I think it wrong in itself, but because I think we should not undertake to go into the machinery of the election in this way.

Mr. NYE. All I desire to say in answer to that is that you have undertaken in this bill to prescribe certain things that these commanders shall do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Generally.

Mr. NYE. This is a great general thing that pertains to this election which is about to take place, more important than anything else; and I trust I shall not be considered as capricious when I suggest that it is the very life of the registry. I want to say one more thing that the commander shall do—let him fix the details as he pleases—that this notice shall be published at least twenty days before the election in three public places, so that the registry may be scrutinized.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I propose the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the duties hereby imposed upon the commanding general of each district and the powers conferred may, with his consent, be performed and exercised by the acting Governor of any State who shall take an oath or affirmation faithfully to do and perform the same, and shall take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office."

I wish simply to say that in Virginia, Arkansas, and Louisiana we have Governors who can take the iron-clad oath. They are men who have been Governors of those States for several years, who know the public men of their States, who know the public sentiment there, and I think, with the assent of the commanding general of their districts, they can discharge these duties better than any persons who may be appointed as general officers. There are only three Governors who can take this oath, and under the amendment the assent of General Schofield, General Ord, or General Sheridan, in each of the respective cases, must be obtained before they can perform these duties. I believe that with their knowledge of men and their knowledge of their States and of the localities of voting and of everything pertaining to those matters, if the commanders would assent to it, these three Governors, or any one of them, could discharge the duty better than any one of those generals. This provision was in the original bill, but it was stricken out by the House of Representatives. I believe, in fact I know, that some of the most earnest men in Virginia, in Louisiana, and in Arkansas, are in favor of it, and were in favor of it before it was brought into either of these Chambers.

Mr. CONNESS. I have three objections to this amendment. One is that it will destroy in the respect to which it applies, or is proposed to apply, the uniformity of the plan, making different sources of authority to put the scheme in operation. Another is that it will enable, if adopted, military commanders who have a desire to do that to shuffle off from themselves the responsibility of putting it into operation. The third is that I would sooner trust either of the military commanders who have been named in these States than I would either of the so-called loyal Governors. I desire to put it in that direct manner. I hope for these reasons the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish in some way to get at some of the propositions on which we have voted in committee. There are several of them on which I desire to have another vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You will have full opportunity when they are offered again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was one amendment, striking out all of the bill after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute.

Mr. DRAKE. I understand that it is now in order to offer amendments to the amendment agreed to in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. Then I move to amend that amendment by inserting as a new section, to come in after section two, the following:

And be it further enacted, That at the said election the registered voters of each State shall vote for or against a convention to form a constitution therefor under this act. Those voting in favor of such a convention shall have written or printed on the ballots by which they vote for delegates as aforesaid the words "For a convention," and those voting against such a convention shall have written or printed on such ballots the words "Against a convention." The persons appointed to superintend said election and to make return of the votes given thereat as heretofore provided, shall count and make return of the votes given for and against a convention; and the commanding general to whom the same shall be returned shall ascertain and declare the total vote in each State for and against a convention. If a majority of the whole number of voters registered in any State as aforesaid shall have voted for a convention, then such convention shall be held as hereinafter provided; but if a majority of such whole number of voters registered shall have voted against a convention, then no such convention shall be held under this act.

It will be perceived by the Senators present that this is the same amendment which I offered in committee, and having expressed myself very fully in regard to it then, I do not propose any further discussion of it at this time. I have been fed from various things that have come to my knowledge since it was voted upon in committee to entertain the hope that the objections of some gentlemen of the Senate who voted against it before have been removed, and that I may now look for their support. I would make this single remark in regard to it, that the Senate having in committee definitively settled the question that a majority of the votes given upon the question of the adoption of the constitution when that shall be framed shall control the ratification of the constitution, instead of a majority of the whole number of registered voters, I simply submit to the judgment of the Senate whether it is not better, under all the circumstances, that this expression should be taken at the hands of the people at the very beginning, and that then a majority of all the registered voters should be required to set the machinery in motion for making a constitution.

I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate; they have indulged me very politely in reference to the discussion of this matter; and I submit this amendment to them in the earnest hope that it may commend itself to their judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. I wish he would explain the idea of the concluding language of his amendment. If I understand the amendment, it is that if a majority of all those registered vote for a convention, a convention shall be held; and if a majority of all those registered vote against a convention, no convention shall be held. Now, suppose a majority do not vote either way, what would the law be under the amendment? If the amendment provided that in case a majority of those registered vote in favor of a convention a convention should be held, and otherwise not, of course I would understand the idea of that, and we should all understand it alike; but I ask the Senator to be good enough to state what his view was in using the language that if a majority vote for it, a convention shall be held, and if a majority vote against it, it shall not be held. Suppose a majority of those registered do not vote either way, what will be the result then?

Mr. DRAKE. Of course the gentleman from New York need not ask me what will be the result. He sees the result just as plainly as any one can see it, and I see it too; but it never occurred to me as within the range of possibility that there would not be a majority of the registered vote one way or the other. It is certainly possible that it might occur that a majority of the registered vote would not vote either way; I understand that, now that the gentleman has called my attention to it; but it never occurred to me before as a contingency to be guarded against.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will ask the Senator to modify his amendment, choosing his own language, so as to provide that if a majority of all those registered vote for a convention it shall be held, and otherwise no convention shall be held as the result of that vote, which will carry out the idea he has.

Mr. DRAKE. There does not occur to me any objection to that modification.

Mr. SHERMAN. Reflection on the proposition made by the Senator from Missouri since he offered it the other day, has led me to the conviction that it may be well enough to take the sense of the people who are on the registry as to whether they desire a State government; and if the Senator would make his proposition conform to the action and deliberate judgment of the Senate, so as to require only a majority of those voting at the election, I would vote for the proposition. The bill itself provides that a majority of the delegates to the convention must first declare the desire of the people to form a State government. That is one mode of ascertaining the sense of the people; but as there is to be an election of delegates, there is no impropriety and no inconvenience in requiring each voter at that election to declare his own opinion on the question. Perhaps it is a better way of getting at the wish and opinion of the people of these States, instead of relying on the vote of the delegates after they are elected; but the proposition as now made simply defeats this bill.

Mr. DRAKE. That is not my intention.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will be the probable result. The Senator himself convinced the Senate by a few remarks he made a while ago that it was unwise to require a majority of all the registered voters to concur in ratifying the constitution. If his argument was good then, the same argument ought to apply now. I think it would be well enough in the preliminary election for delegates to require each voter to vote for or against a State government under this law; and if a majority of those who vote declare in favor of forming a State government under the law, let that be considered the sense of the people, and let the convention meet and at once form a government to carry out the wishes of their constituents. There is but very little difference between an expression by the convention itself after the members are elected and an expression by the people; but as there must necessarily be an election to elect the delegates, it is just as well to take the sense of the people in the beginning; probably it would be better, as the law we passed at the last session submits the whole matter to the people, and says that if the people of the rebel States do so and so we will admit them to representation. I can see the force of the argument which would submit the question at the outset to the people in the election of delegates; and then, if the commanding general finds that a majority of the people of the State have voted in favor of a convention, he calls the convention, the delegates having been elected by the same vote which passed upon the question of a State constitution. If the Senator from Missouri will modify his amendment so as to require only a majority of those voting at that election to determine the question, I shall vote for it, and I think that is probably the best way to get the sense of the people.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Since this amendment was offered the other day I have individually consulted the members of the committee in regard to it, and as the object to be attained is a common one, a majority of the committee—and perhaps I am justified in saying that such is the unanimous opinion of the committee—agreed that if it would avoid discussion, and would be more satisfactory to some of our friends to ascertain the wishes of the people by a direct preliminary vote rather than by a vote of the delegates, there would be no serious opposition to the proposition. I do not exactly feel authorized to say for the committee that they are in favor of this amendment. We thought upon consultation that the best mode was that which is provided in the bill, and let the question of the wish of the people to form a constitution and State government under our legislation be decided by the delegates whom they shall elect, and let that question enter into the election of delegates, because if the delegates elected were opposed to taking action they would defeat the formation of any government even after the people had voted directly to form one. But I agree with the Senator from Ohio that I think a majority of those voting should decide that question.

I have thought it important to adhere to the legislation of last session. The legislation of last session provided that the State constitution, when submitted to all the people for ratification, should be ratified or rejected, according as a majority of those voting on the question should decide, and I was very sorry that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was adopted, which changes that principle, and is a departure from the plan which we laid down. If this amendment which the Senator from Missouri offers could be adopted, with the modification suggested by the Senator from Ohio, leaving it to the majority of those who shall vote in the election of delegates to decide whether there shall be a convention or not, I should not seriously object to it. I see no way, however, of reaching it except by voting down this amendment in the form in which it is proposed, and then if it were offered in the other form I should not object to it. I suppose this being an amendment to an amendment is not now amendable. The only way to get at it would be to vote down this amendment; and then if another amendment should be offered, leaving it to a direct vote of the people to decide at the first election by a majority vote whether they will have a convention or not, I should not seriously oppose it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The chairman of the committee is right in supposing, at least so far as my information extends, that the members of the committee, including himself, would be willing to accept of this amendment if it was at once to secure the passage of the bill. In giving my assent, however, it was not because I believed it was necessary or even advisable. Looking at the peculiar character of the people who are to be called upon to decide the question of convention or no convention, my impression is that it can be much better decided by the convention than may be selected than by the people at the time they give their votes. But for the reason stated by the chairman, if the honorable member from Missouri will modify his amendment so as to require only a majority of those who shall vote, I will give it a very willing assent. I do not think it is proper to require a majority of the whole number.

Mr. DRAKE. I thank the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and the honorable Senator from Maryland, who has just taken his seat, for the manifestation of a disposition to entertain this amendment favorably, if modified. I have no objection myself personally to the modification of the amendment. I have it here just in the form the gentlemen suggest, differing in no respect from that presented, except in the last sentence, the language elsewhere being precisely the same. If that will commend it to the Senate, I would feel very much gratified indeed to have it meet the approval of the Senate, for I really think it desirable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps the whole had better be read.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted. That at said election the registered voters of each State shall vote for or against a convention to form a constitution therefor under this act. Those voting in favor of such a convention shall have written or printed on the ballots by which they vote for delegates as aforesaid the words "For a convention," and those voting against such a convention shall have written or printed on such ballots the words "Against a convention." The persons appointed to superintend said election and make return of the votes given thereat, as hereinafter provided, shall count and make return of the votes given for and against a convention; and the commanding general, to whom the same shall have been returned, shall ascertain and declare the total vote in each State for and against a convention. If a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, then such convention shall be held as hereinafter provided; but if a majority of said votes shall be given against a convention, then no such convention shall be held under this act.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will do.

Mr. CONKLING. It seems to me the proposition to require at the election to which that amendment relates a majority of all the votes registered is a very different proposition from the one we voted upon. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] who made perhaps an opposition as successful as any Senator made to the report of the Judiciary Committee and the action of the House, to place his objections very largely upon the idea that the more unanimous a State might be in favor of the constitution the lighter the vote would naturally be; and I think he used the expression that it would be a mere formal election, a ratification pro forma of something which everybody favored; but, said the Senator, when you elect delegates to the convention, when you pass upon the question whether the convention shall be held, there will be in that election enough of controversy to bring out a large vote on both sides. And yet when we come applying to that election the proposition to ask that a vote shall be necessary, which I undertake to affirm will not probably exceed one third of the legal votes in the State, we are told that the proposition is the same that it would be if we sought to apply it to this pro forma election to ratify a constitution. So I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say.

Mr. WILSON. You must not understand me to say so.

Mr. CONKLING. I have not understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say so. I only say that at one part of this bill the enemies of this proposition put their action upon a ground which indicates that in another part of the bill it would be very proper, and when we come to that the gentlemen who vote in that way see no distinction between the case as we made it before and as we seek to present it now.

Of course I am not idle enough to suppose that anything I can say would vary at all the conclusion to which any gentleman has come, or would be likely, with the Senators absent and the Senators present as they are, to produce any effect or impression whatever. I wish to say, however, that if I supposed this bill was to be voted upon here ultimately, with the Senate composed precisely as it has been since some of the Senators left the Chamber, I should look with great apprehension, with a feeling of great disquiet upon what the Senate in that event would be about to do; because I can conceive of nothing more repugnant to the idea which, as I understand it, has lain at the foundation of the action of the Union party of this country for the last year in Congress and out than the notion apparently insisted upon here that we are to erect in these States governments based upon the absence of majorities, based upon the consent of minorities, and that we are to throw away on the threshold all the opportunities that we have to erect governments there established upon principles really republican.

I want to make but one other remark, and that is this: by just as much as we establish requirements insisting upon a majority of all the legal voters in a State, by so much we indemnify the blacks and the ignorant and helpless of both colors against an invasion of their rights; by so much we offer a reward, an inducement to rebels, and to those unfriendly, to allow the poor and the ignorant to come to the polls, and to induce them to do so. Why? Because they need their suffrages to give life to the institutions they seek to form. On the contrary, the moment that at either of these elections, and more especially at both of them, we make a provision by which with impunity the governing spirits in these States can dispense with the attendance of a majority of those entitled to the suffrage, that instant we not only license, but we offer an inducement to the exercise of all the influences which will banish, which will discourage, which will hinder the poor, the ignorant, and the oppressed from asserting their rights.

I will take the State of South Carolina, as that has been used as the favorite illustration. Is it worth while, when in South Carolina a majority of all the voting population is composed of those men whom recently we have disenthralled and enfranchised, to make provision by which that voting majority can be ignored and excluded with impunity? The Senator from Massachusetts says we are afraid to trust our friends. How strangely he mistakes the argument which I, for one, seek to put forward on this proposition. So far from that, sir, we seek provisions in this bill which shall not only make it necessary to invite these men to take the part which we propose that they shall take, but which shall render their participation essential, which shall render the participation of these black men that desideratum without which the barons of the South will not be able to establish State governments, in lieu of that military government and that provisional government which exists to-day.

For one, sir, I am not afraid to trust these men; far from it. I want to trust them; and I want a provision which in South Carolina will show the world, when a result has been had, that these black men, either all of them or a majority of them, have been allowed to participate, and that they have participated. I do not want a condition of things by which with impunity the men hostile to them, the men hostile to the longevity if not to the existence of this Government, are able, minority though they be, in the first place to inaugurate, and in the last place to consummate the institutions under which that community is to resume what the late President called its proper relations with the Union.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote most cheerfully for this amendment. I see a marked distinction between taking the sense of the people on the day of the election of delegates and taking the sense of the people called to adopt or reject the constitution. The great struggle in each of these States will be on the day of electing delegates. There will be candidates for the convention. They and their friends will make personal efforts to bring out the voters. There will be opposing candidates, and the vote will be a large vote. The real judgment of the State will be taken on that day; and I am willing that on that day when the people are at the ballot-box they shall declare for or against a convention.

My objection to requiring a majority of the registered voters to vote for the adoption of the constitution was this: I do not believe that the average of the constitutions in the country ever received the vote of one third of the legal voters of those States. If Senators will examine the fact, as I had occasion to do a few years ago with some little interest on a matter in which I had some concern, they will find that constitutions and constitutional amendments are adopted by a very small vote of the people. Unless the day of voting be fixed on the day of a general election, in which the great interests of all are concerned, the vote will be a very small vote. Then to give the men who have been defeated in electing delegates, defeated before the people, in the convention, and in the results of the convention, an opportunity by staying at home to be counted and put down the convention, I thought a mistake, and I think so now.

But, sir, on this question of electing delegates, you will find this whole rebel region of country stirred to its profoundest depths. There will be a struggle for the control of the conventions. Let me here express the opinion—the declaration may be taken for what it is worth; it is a matter of opinion—that you will find the great masses of the men we have just enfranchised at the ballot-box on that day voting for a convention and voting to elect delegates who will make constitutions there that will secure them forever the right of suffrage and their other rights; and you will find the secessionists at the polls. If they are beaten there, if they lose the convention, the natural resort of these men would be, if you give them the privilege by staying at home to be counted, to stay at home and keep everybody else at home.

There is to be an election on the fourth Monday of April, I understand, in New York, to elect delegates to a constitutional convention. There will be a great struggle; there will be a large vote on that day; but let that convention meet and make a constitution, and let it be one on which parties agree generally, and then submit it to the people on a day on which there is no other election, and if it brings out two hundred thousand of the eight hundred thousand voters of New York it will be a miracle. Ought the great masses who are satisfied with it and stay at home to be counted against it? Surely not. Look at the vote in the States that have adopted constitutional amendments within a few years. My own town, with a vote of eight hundred, cast but sixty or seventy votes, and the State, with two hundred and forty thousand voters, cast only about twenty-five thousand votes on a very important constitutional amendment, on which some of us divided and took part against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was it?

Mr. WILSON. To put in the constitution a clause requiring a naturalized citizen to be two years resident in the State. Some of our men opposed it. I opposed it. It went into the constitution. I predicted that it would go out in two or three years, and it did go out. We cannot get the masses of the people out to vote on the adoption or rejection of a constitution, unless there is something that divides parties strongly upon it and it is on the day of general election. Now let us have this amendment. We shall get the vote out on the day of the election of delegates, and then we shall get a fair expression of the people who are registered on the subject. I would rather trust the vote of the people on that day than trust the vote of the delegates that will be elected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the Senator from Missouri has so modified his amendment as that a majority of those voting shall control the question whether the convention shall sit. That is the present proposition. Now, Mr. President, my opinion is it is wholly unimportant whether this amendment be adopted or not; and I think the country is not so stupid as to suppose that because there is this apparent popular element thrown into this movement, it is therefore a popular movement; in other words, that it secures the real voice of the people, and that it will be a republican form of government as coming from the people.

The thing stands just in this way: we have established over them a military government; we have stripped them of the provisions of the common law which secure to them the trial by jury and other important rights; and we now say to them at the point of the bayonet, "Adopt this constitution, or live under this military government." It is wholly unimportant whether they vote on the constitution, or the question of their agreeing to this movement be postponed to a period when they can give a more intelligent vote upon the constitution itself. The whole thing is required of them. A free voice of the people is impossible, and I would not be willing that the vote should be taken without expressing this opinion on the subject. A discussion of the formation of a republican government, of establishing free institutions, of the right of the people to govern themselves, of the right of the people to decide their form of government, seems to me to be absurd in the presence of such movements as were inaugurated at the last session of Congress. It is saying to the people of these States, "Adopt a constitution such as we suggest and require, or live under a military government."

I have given my support to the bill as it came from the committee, because I think that almost any form of State government where the people are allowed to vote, where courts will be returned to their jurisdiction, where the right of trial by jury will be returned to the people, where the writ of habeas corpus will be restored to them, is better than the present condition which we have established. I do not care a farthing whether the proposition of the Senator from Missouri is adopted or rejected; it is wholly unimportant. It will mislead nobody. It may produce difficulty in some localities. It may get up a strife before the people are prepared to act intelligently on the subject. What voice do we want? We want to know the free voice of the people upon the constitution that is submitted as their form of government. That is the only important question. That question can only be submitted after the convention has done its work and when the constitution has been framed. When they come to vote now, all they vote on is simply this: are you willing to call a convention to establish negro suffrage, or do you prefer to live under a military government? That is the question that is first presented. It is the only question that they vote upon.

I think myself that this bill is more desirable if the people will act upon it intelligently and calmly and wisely, so far as it is possible for them to do, than to live under the present divided sort of government down there. We have an unlawful government, a government not lawful, and yet it is called a provisional government. What that thing is will be submitted perhaps to the historians and the statesmen to follow us. What an unlawful government, provisional in its character and having some authority is, I cannot undertake to define; but that is the civil institution which the law of last session recognizes. The people are to live, as matters now stand, in the southern States under a provisional government, not a lawful State government, and under a military government. The provisional government may exercise such authority as the military government allows to it. It may be very different in the different States. I think it is the most unfortunate sort of government that was ever established on earth. If you have a straight out despotism the people soon learn to know what it is and become accustomed to the yoke and do not care very much about it; but this uncertain form of government, one thing one year and quite a different thing the next year, is certainly the most objectionable possible form.

Then the question is submitted to the people, "Will you have this or the other which we now propose to you; you may make a State government provided you will make it according to our pleasure?" That is what we now propose. "If you propose State governments according to our pleasure it is all right. We first submit the question to you, will you make a State government according to the pleasure of Congress?" They vote upon that; the delegates are elected; and they form a constitution according to the pleasure of Congress. Then the people once more in the exercise of their own freedom say, "We will do as Congress says we shall do." That is the whole of this business. It may result in good. It cannot be worse than the present condition of affairs. I shall be very glad when the people there settle down upon something. I want to see them represented here.

The Senator from New York asked the question whether the people would starve less, whether they would shiver in the cold for want of clothing less, if they were represented in Congress. I did not know that it was unimportant to a State that she should be represented in the Congress of the United States until it was thus presented by the Senator. Will the people suffer less from poverty in the great State of New York if they are not represented in the Senate? And yet the distinguished Senator would say to all of his people, "Fight to the death rather than be stripped of your equal representation in the Senate." Of course he would say that. It is not a question of bread and butter; but it is a question of the right of the people to representation where their laws are made. It is the greatest right that is enjoyed by any community in the world. The bill of last session and this bill will establish in this country the proposition that Congress may dictate to the States the form and fashion of their State governments, and when they make them to conform to the pleasure of Congress they shall become valid, and when not according to the pleasure of Congress they may be declared illegal.

I have said thus much simply because some of the argument assumed that this business, when completed, would be the voice of the people; the constitutions when formed would be their constitution, and not ours. I do not so regard it; but I think it is better for the people to organize, even under this, than to live under the law that was passed at the last session. So far as the particular proposition that is now before us is concerned, in my judgment, it is as unimportant as anything possibly can be.

Mr. HOWE. The point made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] against the republican character of the governments recently established for these southern communities, I think, is very well taken. I do not think the government we have provided for them in the recent act of Congress is republican. The mistake into which the Senator has fallen, as I think, is in supposing that those governments were made to take the place of republican governments. The governments which they take the place of are not republican. It may be that they come a little nearer that character than those military authorities which we have established there; but if they were nearer republican in their character than the military governments by which we have replaced them, they were not so loyal as those by which we have replaced them. We found the people of those different States under governments which did represent a considerable portion of their people; but then the portion of the people which they represented was not the whole body of the people; it was only a part, after all, and that the rebel, the disloyal part. Now, we have replaced those governments representing only a part of the people, and that the disloyal part, by governments representing a fewer number of the people, I must confess, but then they represent only the loyal. Disloyal governments are removed to make place for loyal governments, neither being republican in their character. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, as to the amendment pending, I wish to vote for it because I believe in it. It presents us no question of the establishing of governments by minorities. There is nothing of the kind. It does not make that possible. If there is a majority of the people in any of these districts opposed to the government or the constitution or the convention which this bill provides, they can defeat it by going to the polls and voting against it. But I have heard since I have become a member of the Republican party a great deal said first and last about the beauty of equal rights and of equal justice, and I supposed there was some beauty in it because I have heard so much said about it; but you can never make me believe, I think, that there is any equality of rights or of justice in the proposition which makes the wishes of the man who stays at home, plowing upon his farm or at work in his shop, countervail and annul the wishes of the free elector who mounts his horse or takes to the footpath and goes to the election and deposits his vote. That is not equal right or equal justice, or if it be, equal rights and equal justice are not the beautiful commodities they have been cracked up to be.

One word, sir, in reply to some remarks which have been submitted with great force by the Senator from New York. If I supposed that we were providing for an election in any of those communities in which slaves were to go to the polls and deposit their votes with masters, then I should feel with the Senator from New York that there was a necessity for some provision by which the master should be compelled to let his slave go and vote. But I do not perceive that to be the work in which we are engaged. It seems to me that we are opening an election at which only free men are to be heard, an election at which the supreme law says that all men may vote. True, some of them have been slaves; but they are slaves no longer. If I supposed there were to be remaining in those communities any moral influence of any kind or measure, any higher law than that which we enact, by which the old master could keep his former slave from the polls, I would not commit these prerogatives of a State to any such community under any such circumstances, and it ought not to be done. That is all I care to say on this question.

Mr. CRAGIN. I am in favor of this amendment as it is now proposed, and for this reason: if in the outset, before any convention is held, it is apparent that the majority of those who vote are against a convention, it is certainly useless to go through with the work of forming a constitution that shall be submitted to the people and then rejected. As the amendment now stands, proposing that a majority of those who vote shall decide the question whether a convention be called or not, I am in favor of it.

Mr. President, for more than a year past the Macedonian cry has come up to these Halls from the white loyalists of the South and from the freedmen there, "Come and help us." By our recent legislation we have reinforced the white loyalists by giving the right to vote to the freedmen of the South, and in addition to this we have given them the aid of the military power of this Government to protect them in their rights. Sir, in voting to-day I have tried to give such votes as should deprive the rebels, those who have been making war upon these white loyalists and these freedmen, of the power to defeat the wishes of these men in reconstructing these States. I desire that these States shall be reconstructed and in the hands of the loyal men there, white and black; and for one, I shall give no vote here that will enable the rebels by staying away from the polls or otherwise to defeat the will of the majority of the loyal men there. I desire that as soon as possible this military government shall be removed from these States, and that a State government, republican in form, officered and controlled by Union men, those who love the Union and the flag, shall take the place of this military government. I rejoice that the signs that come to us since the passage of the military reconstruction bill are so favorable. I rejoice that there are signs that the people there are moving in the right direction, and that the time is not far distant when we shall see this Government restored, when we shall see men from these States here in our midst, men who can take the iron-clad oath, for none others can come. Such men I am willing to associate with; such men I want to associate with; and for that reason I rejoice in these signs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. DRAKE. I will suggest to the Senator from Oregon, with his permission, that the adoption of this amendment makes another amendment in the third section necessary, and if he will allow me, while the subject is up—

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I was going to propose, to amend the third section.

Mr. DRAKE. I have it prepared here, and with the permission of the honorable Senator from Oregon, I will offer it. I move to amend section three of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which will now be section four, by striking out after the word "shall" in the twelfth line the words—

First determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of such State to frame a constitution and civil government according to the provisions of this act, and the act to which it is supplementary, and if so, shall proceed to frame such constitution.

And to insert:

Proceed to frame a constitution and civil government according to the provisions of this act and the act to which it is supplementary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no need of striking out these words and then reinserting them. All the change that is necessary is to insert the word "proceed" in the fourteenth line, and leave the words that are in the bill as they stand. Those words are there, and it will be much better understood, I think, by the Senators who have the bill in their hands, simply to insert the words which are necessary to make the bill conform to the amendment which has been adopted, than it will be to strike out a whole sentence and then insert it in manuscript, which will not be before us.

Mr. DRAKE. With all respect to the honorable Senator, I will suggest to him that if his mode of amendment is the one adopted it requires taking out words in two places. It cannot be done otherwise.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is very easily done. Strike out words in two places and insert one word, "proceed," and you have the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. Very well; I will agree to that course if the Senator will designate the words to be stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. After "shall" in the fourteenth line strike out "first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of such State" and insert the word "proceed;" and in line eighteen strike out the words "and if so, shall proceed to frame such constitution."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri accept that modification?

Mr. DRAKE. That accomplishes it in the same way, and I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is another amendment necessary to complete this. In the eleventh line, after the word "and" should be inserted the words "if a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, the commanding general," and the word "he" in the twelfth line should be stricken out; so as to read:

And if a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, the commanding general shall notify the delegates to assemble in convention, &c.

As it stands it would be inconsistent with the amendment that has been adopted, because it would positively require the commanding general to call a convention, which he is not to do except in that contingency. I therefore move that amendment in the third section as it is printed, but which will now be section four.

Mr. CONKLING. But we are going to vote on the question again of making it a majority of the registered votes, and if that shall be adopted we shall want this clause to conform to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have already adopted this principle, requiring a majority of those voting.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will excuse me, I intend to move, if no other Senator does, to strike out those words and put them back as the amendment was before it was modified, and if that vote should happen to prevail—we have not had an opportunity of taking it yet—then the amendment which he now proposes ought to correspond with that, and whether it is put first or last is a mere matter of convenience.

Mr. SUMNER. I had proposed to renew the amendment that I offered, to strike out the word "qualified" and insert "registered," and also to insert the word "all" before the words "the electors."

Mr. TRUMBULL. We may as well decide one thing at a time. If the Senator from New York desires to have another vote on that question, why not take it on the words I propose and have it settled here?

Mr. CONKLING. We have not had a vote upon it. The mover modified it, so that we got no vote on the question, and it is the desire of several Senators to have a direct vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment that is now before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section three, now made section four, by inserting after the word "and" in the eleventh line the words "if a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention the commanding general;" and in the twelfth line to strike out the word "he;" so that it will read:

And if a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, the commanding general, within sixty days from the date of election, shall notify the delegates to assemble in convention, &c.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, I submit to my friend from New York that if he desires a distinct vote on that question, perhaps it might be taken on this amendment, which I suggest merely to conform to the other, and then if this is rejected, it will be necessary to change the other; and if it is adopted, it will avoid the necessity of two votes.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no preference about it. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] was going to move an amendment, as I understand, to take the sense of the Senate, as it might have been taken had the Senator from Missouri adhered to his amendment as originally offered, but he modified it so as to require a majority of those voting in place of a majority of those registered; and if it be agreeable to the Senator from Illinois, I will move now to take the sense of the Senate upon that question, or after the vote is taken on his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir. I was suggesting to the Senator to take the vote on my amendment. Why not have a test on that?

Mr. CONKLING. That cannot be done, because if it is not adopted the Senate will have to go back and take a vote on the amendment which it is proposed to modify, whereas if the vote is taken on my proposition the Senator's amendment will follow to correspond.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The only object is to save two or three votes, if the Senator from New York will understand my purpose. This raises the precise question. If this amendment which I have proposed is adopted, then he does not wish to make any motion, for that settles it.

Mr. CONKLING. Most certainly. There is where the Senator is wrong. This would have to be modified in conformity to that, because it is a preceding section, and you have two votes, whereas if you vote on this your amendment will follow as a matter of course.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is very difficult, it seems, to make myself understood. The amendment already adopted leaves the decision to a majority of those voting. That is already adopted. Now, I propose an amendment to conform to that already adopted, leaving it to a majority of the votes. If the Senate refuse to adopt my amendment, then we have got an expression of the opinion of the Senate that the other must be changed. If the Senate adopt my amendment, that is the end, and one vote settles it.

Mr. CONKLING. That is precisely my proposition. If the Senate does not adopt this amendment it must go back, having voted upon this, and voted upon the preceding amendment which it wants to modify, whereas if the vote is taken first on that, this follows as a matter of course without any vote at all. It is a question between two votes and one; that is all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I insist on my amendment. I cannot make the Senator from New York understand it as I do. Let us see how the Senate will vote on this amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I understand it. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, if it is in order, I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, so that it will read:

If a majority of the voters registered as aforesaid shall vote in favor of a convention, then such convention shall be held as hereinafter provided.

I need not state the residue of the amendment; otherwise the convention is not to be held.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state that it is prepared in the other amendment just in accordance with that general idea.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware of that; still I must offer it in this form to be in order; so that the proposition is simply now to require a majority of the registered voters, instead of a majority of those voting.

Mr. POMEROY. That amendment having been agreed to in Committee of the Whole, it is not now in order to amend it.

Mr. CONKLING. It was not in Committee of the Whole, but in the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But the amendment having been agreed to in those very words and in its present form, I suppose it is not now in order to amend it.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us take a vote on it by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We could have done it a moment ago, but the Senator refused to take it.

Mr. CONKLING. I think my motion is strictly in order, for I move to strike out the words which the Senator from Missouri has inserted. A motion to strike out and insert, the amendment having been adopted, not in Committee of the Whole, but in the Senate, I submit is in order. That must be so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As I understand the state of the question, it is this: in the Senate, since we came out of committee, the Senator from Missouri has moved an amendment which the Senate has adopted. The Senator from New York, after it is adopted, proposes to strike out a portion of it. That is the question. I submit that he cannot get at it in that shape.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order, in the opinion of the Chair, to move to strike out a portion of an amendment which has already been agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was adopted if the point of order is insisted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. There was no division on that amendment, so that the question whether I voted one way or the other does not arise.

Mr. DRAKE. I very much hope the amendment proposed will not prevail. I think it had better be allowed to stand as it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the motion be stated before you begin to argue it. The Senator from New York moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri was adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that I simply wish to say that the Senator from New York has avowed his purpose in moving to reconsider to be to change it from a majority of those voting to a majority of all the registered voters. We all understand it. Let us take a test question on reconsidering; those who are opposed to the change can vote against reconsideration; and it will be a saving of two or three votes.

Mr. CONKLING. We had better have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to make one remark. I said nothing when the question was up before; but I cannot allow the vote to be taken now without expressing in one word the ground on which I shall place my vote.

We have just come out from the fires of a terrible rebellion, and our special purpose now is to set up safeguards against the recurrence of any such calamity, and also for the establishment of peace and tranquillity throughout that whole region. There is no Senator within the sound of my voice who is not anxious to see that great end accomplished. How shall that be done? Is it by founding your governments on a majority or on a minority? If these were common times, then I should listen to the argument of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE,] and also of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] to the effect that the government might be founded on a majority of those who actually vote, although they were really a minority of the population; but at this moment, when we are seeking to recover ourselves from the rebellion and to guard against it in future, I cannot expose the country to any such hazards. Let us take the precaution to found our governments now solidly, firmly, on a majority, not merely a majority of those who vote, but a majority of all the registered voters. Then will your Government be rooted and anchored in principle, so that it cannot be brushed aside. How was it when the rebellion began? Everything was done by minorities. It was a minority in every State that carried it into rebellion. I wish now that the new government should be planted firmly on a majority, so that it can never again be disturbed. I can see no real certainty of security for the future unless you set up that safeguard.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON (when Mr. HENDERSON's name was called) said: I agreed to pair off with the Senator from Missouri. He would have voted in favor of the reconsideration, and I against it.

The calling of the roll was concluded, and the result announced—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelighuysen, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Hendricks, Morton, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—14.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the bill is now open for discussion and amendment, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; it was agreed that that should be a test vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we adjourn now, we shall have all these speeches over on Monday, and I do not think we can have them more than once around to-night. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 12, noes 25.

Mr. CONKLING. I now move my amendment. The amendment is that a majority of the voters registered—

Mr. DRAKE. It is all written in the last sentence of my amendment, as I proposed it originally.

Mr. CONKLING. Not precisely. I do not want to take it as written in the first place, because I do not think it expresses the idea. I want to move to amend by saying that "if a majority of the voters registered as aforesaid shall vote in favor of such convention the same shall be held; otherwise no convention shall be called."

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator that he had better use the words "that the delegates elected to such convention shall not assemble."

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; "such convention shall not assemble."

Mr. TRUMBULL. While the Secretary is preparing that amendment, I desire to say that the amendment being changed in this form, I prefer the bill as it was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I think we had better reject the amendment. It is manifest that this is merely working in a circle. The delegates are to be elected to the convention at the same time that the people vote upon the question. Now, suppose that a majority of the delegates are opposed to a convention, opposed to forming a constitution, and a majority of the registered voters vote in favor of forming a constitution; will you get any? What is the practical effect of it? What did the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TITTON] tell you the other day? That a majority of the voters in Nebraska voted in favor of forming a constitution, and their delegates met together and dispersed without forming any constitution. Nothing was accomplished by it. You have to act through representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was no harm done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There was this much harm done: you took a vote, but it amounted to nothing. Now, we have provided in this bill, as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary, in the usual form, that the delegates themselves shall determine when they meet together whether it is the wish of the people to form a constitution and State government in accordance with these acts, and that question will enter into the election of delegates. There is the safety. The candidate will be questioned to know whether he is in favor of forming a government under the act, and if he is not he will not be elected; and a majority will speak through the candidate. I shall therefore vote against the amendment, although I was willing to acquiesce, because there were members of the Senate who seemed to attach some importance to it. I confess I did not think there was any considerable importance in it—in the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Missouri. I thought we got at the wishes of the people quite as well by the bill as it came from the committee; but others thought differently, and I was willing to take it if it was left to a majority vote.

I wish to say that there is one serious objection, in my judgment, to requiring a majority of those registered, and if I can get the attention of the Senate for one moment I desire to call it to this view of the question. It is desirable that the people of the South should participate in the formation of these governments. That is the object of the Senator from New York. He desires to have a majority of the people, and all the people if he can, participate in the formation of these governments. Now, you are holding out to them an inducement not to participate; you are encouraging them to take no part. How? Because that is the easiest way to defeat the formation of the government on the part of those who wish to do it. You submit to the people whether they will ratify the constitution that has been formed; but what do you require? You require a majority of all those registered to vote for the constitution. Then how are you going to defeat the constitution? What would you do and what would I do if we were in any of these rebel States and wanted to defeat the formation of a constitution? We would stay away from the polls; and the man who stayed away from the polls would not only be equal, as was said a moment ago by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] to the one who mounted his horse or took the footpath and went to the polls, but his vote is to be superior, because he has the advantage of all the stay-aways on his side. All those who are favorable to the constitution cannot go to the polls. Some will be sick. It will be impossible for others to go. They never can all go; it is an impossibility. Out of one hundred thousand voters probably you would never get more than ninety thousand to the polls. Now, take one hundred thousand voters and suppose that sixty thousand were in favor of the constitution and form of government, and only forty thousand opposed to it. The probabilities are two to one that your government would fail. The forty thousand would stay away, and at least ten thousand out of that sixty thousand would be unable to get to the polls. Nobody would go to the polls to vote against the constitution, because a vote would count more by staying away than by going. Out of the sixty thousand of the one hundred thousand voters who were favorable to the constitution it is not probable you could ever get fifty thousand of them to the polls. The other forty thousand, by keeping away as many as they could, particularly among the colored population, persuading them not to go to the polls, occupying them in business away from the polls, would defeat the formation of the government. So far from having a majority rule, you provide by this species of legislation for a minority to control.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this question has been decided, I believe, by the Senate in one form. The Senate has decided that it will only require a majority of the votes cast to ratify the constitution. But it is now proposed, in the very beginning of this work, before the people of the South are fairly aroused, before there has been much discussion there, to require a majority of all the votes registered to have a convention. I know that the Senator from New York, who offers this amendment, is earnestly in favor of reconstruction; but I know it will be said out of this Senate and over this land that this is an intentional obstacle to reconstruction. We shall be charged with having provided a method by which the rebels can stave off the work of reconstruction and continue in existence the present rebel State governments. That will be simply the effect of it. We shall have to meet that charge, and defend ourselves the best way we can.

Now, sir, I take it that those who voluntarily stay away from an election thereby tacitly consent to be bound by the action of those who go to the election. We are doing business on that principle in the Senate every day. Important bills are passed here, millions of dollars voted away, and not one vote cast. The silence of the body is taken as evidence of their consent to the measure. When men voluntarily stay away from an election, because of their indifference, because of their hatred, or from any other cause, they must be held tacitly to consent that those who take the trouble to go to the election shall decide the questions for them. We have a right to receive their conduct upon that hypothesis.

Now, sir, if we want to provide a way by which the rebels can put off indefinitely this work of reconstruction, by which they can indefinitely prolong the existence of the present rebel State governments, the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York will answer that purpose precisely. But, sir, if we are in earnest about this work of reconstruction, if we wish to bring it to a termination within a reasonable time, let us simply provide—and I am willing to agree to that—that a majority of the votes cast at this preliminary election shall decide the question whether there shall be a convention or not.

Mr. DRAKE. I was very much in hopes that this question would have been finally disposed of without my troubling the Senate with any further remarks in regard to it; but, sir, I cannot suffer this matter to pass without saying a few words.

I fully concur in the views expressed by the honorable Senator from Illinois and the honorable Senator from Indiana. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one view of this matter, which seems to me to have great weight. We are legislating for an election to be held, not among a people who are fully informed in regard to all matters and can see all the bearings of the actions of different men, but for a people who have not been accustomed to these things; and here is a game of deception which could be played upon the poor men in the South who are not acquainted with such matters that has not been adverted to. Suppose that the rebels do not want to vote upon this question. Suppose they do not wish to have a majority vote for a convention. All they have to do in order to create the impression that there is no necessity for the men in favor of a convention to vote upon it is for themselves to stay away from the polls and conceal from those men the fact that a vote of a majority of all the registered voters is necessary to carry the question. When they have done that they have accomplished all. They have told them it is not worth while for them to go.

But, sir, suppose this view has not any force in it, then I fall back upon the proposition which was enunciated by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] a while ago, and after the enunciation of which I was, I confess, very much surprised at his vote to reconsider this amendment, to wit, that the great point of interest in the election will be that which is personal. You may take any election you please, sir, and you will find the great point of interest in it is always that which is personal to the candidates who are before the people; and that personal consideration, and the desire to have particular individuals elected to the convention, or to defeat particular individuals who are candidates for the convention, will lead to a larger vote of the people twice over at that election than you can ever get upon the adoption of the constitution. Therefore it is that if the people go to the polls it is almost inevitably certain, when they go there to elect delegates, a majority will vote for the holding of a convention or against it; but yet it is in the power of a minority there, by the course that I have mentioned, to deceive the majority, and induce them not to vote on the question of convention or no convention, to keep from them the knowledge that that question is to be voted upon, and make them believe that nothing is to be voted for but candidates to the convention. Sir, with all respect to the honorable gentleman from New York, I consider that this amendment, if adopted, is one which is extremely dangerous to the success of reconstruction in some of these States, if not perhaps fatal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will briefly state one or two reasons why I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York. I think after we have established this machinery for reorganization that we ought not so to provide that the proceedings may be stopped at any stage until a constitution is made and submitted to Congress. Now, if this amendment proposed by the Senator is adopted, when the question of convention or no convention is submitted to the people, if a majority of the registered voters do not vote for a convention, then all proceedings are forever stopped, and there is no way in which the people of that State can proceed to reorganize the government without further legislation by Congress. Now, sir, at the time that that question may be submitted to the people they may not be enlightened as to the advantages of a State organization. Many of them may feel indifferent as to whether or not their practical relations with the Union are restored, and they may not attend the polls for the purpose of voting. But if this bill so provides that at that election there shall be delegates elected, and they shall proceed to form a State constitution, it may be that between the time when they vote upon the question of convention or no convention, and the time when the constitution is submitted to them, they may change their opinions; and it may be that thousands and tens of thousands of men who were opposed to a State organization at the time the question of convention or no convention was submitted to the people may be willing to favor a State organization when the constitution is submitted for ratification or rejection. Now, sir, these delegates assemble. Before the convention meets the people will not know what sort of a constitution will be formed by those delegates. Some of them may have apprehensions that a constitution will be made so that it will not be acceptable to them, and for that reason they may avoid the election; but when the delegates assemble and frame a constitution, and that constitution is submitted to the people, then they may see that it is such a constitution as will induce a very large majority of the people to vote for its ratification; and in that way the constitution may be submitted to Congress.

It should be remembered that we are not bound by any of these proceedings, from the initiatory step that is taken, up to the time that the constitution is submitted to Congress; but when these proceedings are completed and the constitution is formed and presented to Congress, then we have the right to review all that has taken place in one of these States, and if in our judgment it is not advisable that that State should be readmitted, or its representation be received, we have the right to reject the constitution and the representation, and say to those people they shall proceed under further legislation, such as we may enact, for a new reorganization.

I think it will be a fatal step for us to so provide in this law that at the very first step, when the preliminary question as to whether or not there shall be a convention is submitted to the people, to put it in the power of those who are hostile to this movement, or who are indifferent to it, to stop all proceedings, at once to paralyze the efforts of those people in the States who are desirous to return to the Union. It seems to me to be the part of wisdom to let this proceeding go on. There will no doubt be more or less irregularity; there will no doubt be more or less hostility evinced and conflict then; but let the proceedings go on from beginning to end. Do not provide a way in which those proceedings can be permanently stopped until a constitution is formed, and the people can see what the constitution contains, and act upon it; and then when the constitution is submitted to Congress, Congress can determine whether or not those proceedings have been such as to express the judgment of a majority of the people. If, when that constitution is submitted to Congress, it appears that it does embody the judgment of a majority of the people of the State, and is a republican constitution in form, and recognizes the equal rights of all the citizens, then Congress can admit the State. If such be the fact, to be ascertained by Congress when the constitution is submitted, what difference does it make as to these preliminary proceedings in the formation of that constitution? I say that Congress reserves to itself the right to reject that constitution if it sees that it does not embody the sentiments and wishes and views of a majority of the people, and is not acceptable to them.

I desire to see this experiment tried. We have passed a bill providing what those people shall do, what their constitution shall contain. We now propose to provide the machinery by which that work shall be accomplished. Now, let us allow the experiment to be fairly tried in each one of these States; and if we are satisfied when the experiment is tried that all has been done that ought to be done, let the State be readmitted; if not, let it be rejected. These are my reasons for opposing this amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is quite natural, Mr. President, at any rate it is quite common, not to say almost invariable, when a man has expressed an opinion that he is very apt to stick to it. That is my case; but I do not think it is so manifest in the case of some other gentlemen who seem to have changed front a little. If I recollect rightly, the honorable Senator from Missouri, when he first offered this amendment required that the constitution should be adopted by a majority of the registered voters. I think I am not mistaken. He now tells us that if we adopt his original idea he thinks it will be very injurious, if not fatal. It seems that he is of that class of people who are willing to admit that they can be wiser to-day than they were yesterday. I believe it is the same case also with the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary; for if I am rightly informed, it was understood by that committee, when this bill was reported, that it embraced the idea, not on this particular vote, but on the adoption of the constitution finally, that it should be adopted by a majority of the registered voters; and yet we now find the honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, contending most strenuously against that requirement, and thinking it will be almost fatal. I am very glad to find that gentlemen can so readily convince themselves that it is possible for them to be in error. I wish I could.

But with regard to the particular question before the Senate, I confess that I do not like the proposition exactly, and yet I am obliged to take it. I remarked the other day when I suggested an amendment, or was speaking of one which I thought I might suggest, that if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was adopted it might render the one which I should propose unnecessary. That was not adopted, however, and therefore I proposed my amendment. Perhaps I should not have objected to both of them. It struck me then, and I cannot get rid of the idea, and that is precisely the difficulty that meets my mind; I cannot get rid of the idea that it is our duty so to fix this matter that we shall not have it thrown in our teeth that by virtue of military power exercised in these States we have forced a State into the Union by the vote of a minority of its people. If this was an ordinary proceeding in an ordinary case, and we were called upon to make provision for the framing of a constitution in the first place, and the adoption of it afterward, I should accede, without the slightest hesitation in the world, to the correctness of the rule that a majority of those who voted should govern; that that should be taken as the expression of the will of the people. It has been so heretofore, and as a general rule, as an almost invariable rule, it should be so. But, sir, be it remarked—and that was the difficulty that I wanted to avoid—we sent to these people a military government, proposed originally for one single purpose, and that purpose was simply and solely to protect the loyal people of those States against oppression, the minority from being oppressed by the majority. That was the idea, and the only idea. But we ingrafted upon it a plan for the reconstruction of those States. As we left it, I would have been satisfied to leave it to-day, and that is, that having provided protection for the loyal people, for the minority against the majority, we should leave them to work out their own salvation in their own way with reference to forming a constitution, we retaining the power to judge of the mode in which it was framed, and the provisions of it afterward. We were, and should have been, perfectly safe on that. We could know how that constitution was adopted, whether regularly or irregularly; if irregularly, whether in such a mode that we could waive the irregularity, which we would have a perfect right to do; or whether it had provisions in it that prevented our acceptance and adoption of it. It would have been all in our power, perfectly so.

But, sir, we are not content with that. Instead of leaving it to the people to work the matter out in their own way, as I would be perfectly willing to do, retaining the power of supervision, we go further and say, this military government which we send there shall take the initiative, and not only take the initiative, but shall govern all the details and settle the manner in which that is to be done. Now, sir, you see the danger of this. I see it, or I think I do. They are not a people satisfied, or likely to be satisfied, with what we do. The large majority of the white population, probably nineteen twentieths of them, are disposed to find fault with everything we do, disposed to place themselves, if not in an attitude of rebellion, in an attitude of hostility; and I think it becomes us to look well that we give no proper occasion, and not only no proper occasion, but no plausible occasion for accusations of that kind that may be made against us.

Hence, sir, the proposition which I submitted to the Senate, and which I do not mean to argue again since the Senate have decidedly rejected it. The proposition was founded on the idea that there should be no ground of complaint; that the men who went out should be the men who should ask to come in; that those who complained the loudest should be those who should ask us to take them back; so that it would not lie in their mouths in any shape or form to say afterward that there had been any military force brought to bear upon them, for they were to be left to do as they pleased with regard to the matter; but on the ground (although I did not agree with the reason) that that would be leaving our friends there at the mercy of their enemies in this matter of voting in this particular question, the Senate decided that they would not take that idea. Had they taken it I would have voted against this proposition, because we should have taken away all sort of pretense of complaint that a military government had forced on the people there what the people were not willing to receive.

But the Senate rejected it, and the same difficulty occurs to me again. This military government which we send there we not only call upon to take charge of and protect the people, but we call upon that military government to direct all the civil affairs of that people in the operation of framing a constitution and establishing a State government. We go further than the original idea of the act of last session, which, in my judgment, was a proper idea, and expose ourselves to the very charge that has been made against this Administration, of framing a government by a minority, and putting the people in those States in the hands of a minority.

Now, sir, I want to guard against that, and that is my only reason. I wish to have something on the record which will show that the majority of that people have decided that they will have a convention.

Mr. HOWE. Every man has a right to vote against it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly every man has a right to vote against it; but if there is to be a vote for it, if the convention is to meet, and if a constitution is to follow, and that constitution is to be adopted, framed as it is under the direction and almost under the control of the military which we send there, I wish to have it to say most distinctly and directly that a majority of those people have decided that question, and not leave it to a mere vote of a majority of those who do vote, and have it thrown in our teeth afterward that it was done under the fear of the military.

That, sir, is my only reason for having voted as I have voted, and as I propose to vote.

I do not like the principle; but it must be remembered that this is an anomalous case, anomalous in all respects; in the first place, anomalous and strange from the particular circumstances in which those people are placed; in the next place, anomalous and strange in the fact that all is to be done under the control of the military government which we send down to direct their affairs. It is the part of wise men to shun the appearance of evil, and I do not wish to have even a pretense upon which it can be said that we have exercised an undue control, and that the expression of the polls is not the expression of the people themselves who are to be affected by what is to be done.

As to this argument that the minority can defeat the majority, I cannot see any particular force in it; and why? Because if those people want it they can say so; if they do not want it they can stay at home; it will be perfectly well understood. If, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] says, everybody is likely to be in favor of it down there, all the colored people, all the white Union people, and a very large proportion of those who were rebels, there is no difficulty in their expressing their opinions on the subject at the polls; and a minority staying away, if a majority go to the polls and vote for a convention, will not affect the question one way or the other. I see no difficulty in that respect; and with regard to that which seems to trouble the mind of my friend from Indiana on the subject, I am perfectly willing to meet my constituents or anybody else's constituents upon that question, and tell them why I did it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that I suppose we had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought you took the other as a test question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did; but I find some Senators voted for a reconsideration in order to have a direct vote on the question itself. I have been so informed by a member of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have paired off on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] He would have voted in favor of the amendment and I against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conklings, Corbett, Edmunds, Fessenden, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Morton, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Riddle, Salisbury, and Sprague—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend—

Mr. DRAKE. I suggest that the question is now to be taken on my amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri the question now will be on an amendment to that amendment which I am about to propose.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator was going to offer another proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as the Senate has proceeded to consider this amendment in this way, perhaps not strictly in order, I propose to add the following words, merely the proviso which was agreed to before:

Provided further, That such convention shall not be held unless a majority of all such registered voters shall have voted on the question of holding such convention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest whether it is now in order to move to amend the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate has proceeded to consider the question of amending this very amendment, and it is a little late for Senators now to raise the question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no question raised on the last amendment. Perhaps that was not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good, sir; I can move it after the amendment is adopted. I merely followed the practice of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to amend the amendment reported by the committee by adding immediately after the amendment just adopted the following proviso:

Provided further, That such convention shall not be held unless a majority of all such registered voters shall have voted on the question of holding such convention.

Mr. CONNESS. Is not that the same question we have just voted upon?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. The same in substance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will explain that this amendment is a mere coincident to the one that the Senate by a large majority has agreed to in the other part of the bill. I presume there will be no objection to it. There ought not to be, certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire simply to say that this is precisely the vote we have voted upon, with this difference: if a majority of the registered persons can by any means be kept away from this election, the constitution is defeated. I look upon all these movements as obstacles to reconstruction, as obstacles in the way of carrying out the legislation of Congress. This holds out an encouragement to those who wish to defeat the action of Congress to stay away and take no part in these proceedings except to have their names registered. If you cannot get enough to register to constitute a majority who do not desire any action to take place, all they have to do is to keep away from the polls, take no part in the formation of the government. This is the same thing as requiring a majority of all the registered voters to vote in favor of calling the convention, because it requires that a majority shall vote upon that question, and encourages everybody who wants to defeat the object to stay away from the polls.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The force of that argument may be best illustrated by this very body. We require every day a majority of the body to vote upon every question; and yet one half of that majority and one over controls the legislation of the Senate every day. Now, then, is it any argument against having a majority of the Senate here acting that we are to require only one over a half of that majority to act? Is it any argument in favor of a Senate composed of only a quarter of its number that only a quarter are necessary to control its action when a majority are here? It is certainly a new argument if it be one; and one that the public in forming constitutions and requiring majorities to act one way or the other ought to have discovered before this time.

Now, the proposition is to set up governments in these States. How are they to be set up? Are they to be set up by our will, independent of the will of the people over whom they are to operate, and whose lives and property are to be affected by their administration, or are they to be set up by the concurrent will of the representatives of the people here and of the people themselves there? That is the question. I take it we shall all agree that they are to be set up by the concurrent will; that it must not only be our will and our wish as representing the nation, but that these local governments, if they deserve the name of governments in any form or pretense or pretext free at all, must be local governments that are acted for or upon at least by a majority of the people over whom they are to operate.

Now, how are you to get at the opinion of that majority? How are you to find out whether the majority of that people are willing or unwilling to have the particular kind of government which may be produced for them? The Senator says if people, after being registered, will not go and vote against having a particular form of government, then a dozen men in any State may set up one for them. Is there any more strength in that argument than there is in the reverse of it, that if a majority of the people are not willing to come out and act one way or the other the government shall not be instituted? Is it to be assumed that the votes on this question are to be all one way for a convention, or all against a convention? I take it not.

Now, then, it will certainly be a startling proposition for the people of this country, when they reflect upon it, and we shall hear of it again, if it be said, in addition to what has been said by my friend from Maine, that at the point of the bayonet we not only enforce order and security there, which was what we began to do, but impose upon that people, good, bad, and indifferent, the black man and the loyal white man and the ex-rebel, to call him such, and the present rebel, if there be any such there, and I suspect there are—impose upon all that community, operating upon all of them alike, a government which is to be set up by less than a majority of the loyal people themselves, who are called upon to act upon it; and not only set up by less than a majority, but set up by our express vote, by refusing a provision of this kind, by less than a majority acting either way. Any number, however small, are to be authorized to set up these governments; and when this convention is called it will be noticed that the duty by this law is imposed upon it imperatively to frame a constitution, not, as is usual in the case of ordinary conventions, being left free to deliberate whether they can agree upon a constitution or not, or whether they can frame one which they think ought to be submitted to the people, but they shall form a constitution which shall be sent to the people. Having said that, ought we not to take this little precaution of requiring that, of those who have taken the oath and been registered, a majority shall act, as we are required here to act, upon that question? I did not intend to have said a word, because I supposed the question was settled. I have only said this in justice to myself in reply to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Anywhere else than in the Senate I should think it unreasonable, after such a protracted discussion of these subjects, to represent and rediscuss a question that is on the surface, that can be understood by the reading of it. I think we ought to come to a vote on the questions involved in this bill. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to adopt this proposition, I am perfectly satisfied with it. If it is not, then I think when the Senate says so it ought to be considered as decided. This thing of sitting here all night and acting in a circle is not very agreeable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Swinging around the circle."

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is about as agreeable as that was. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate adopted this very amendment in another part of the bill by a large majority.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then why offer it again?

Mr. EDMUNDS. So as to apply it to this proposition which is now for the first time introduced into the beginning of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. To make it harmonious.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then if the Senate have agreed to it, I do not care about it one way or the other; I am perfectly satisfied. If the Senate have agreed to it let us adopt it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate has not agreed to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But this thing of rediscussing a question I am tired of.

Mr. HOWARD. The object which has been had in view by Senators who have sought to amend this bill as it came from the hands of the Judiciary Committee, has been to get some security in the form of the expression of the will of the majority of the people of the rebel States showing their willingness to come back into the Union. That has been my great object, and I believe that has been the great object of other members who have sought to introduce amendments.

Now, sir, the Senator from Illinois tells us, for the tenth time at least, that he looks upon all such propositions as this as obstacles to reconstruction, as if we were under some great and obvious obligation to pass some act for the reconstruction of the rebel States and their immediate admission into the Union. Sir, I acknowledge no such obligation. I acknowledge only the obligation which we have assumed upon ourselves in the form of the statute which we passed this present month. That I have often said I am willing to carry out faithfully according to its true spirit and intent. What is that, sir? That statute holds out this proposition to the people of the rebel States:

That when the people of any of said rebel States shall have formed a constitution and form of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects, framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said State twenty-one years old and upward, &c.

Who are meant by "the people" of the rebel States, according to the clause which I have read from this statute? Does it mean to include a minority only of the people of those States? Did we say to the people of the rebel States, "A minority of your own numbers shall have authority to form a constitution?" No, sir; our language is "the people" of those States; and we then proceed in the same clause to define what we mean by the people of those States, to wit: every male citizen twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever color he may be. We included in the term "people" both blacks and whites who have reached the age of majority, and we intended that all those people should have an opportunity to participate, in some form, upon this great question of forming a constitution by which they could secure their readmission into the Union. We meant that, and we meant nothing less and nothing else; and now we are told by the Senator from Illinois and those who adhere to the principles of his bill that a mere minority of the people themselves, constituting a majority of those actually voting upon this most important question, will answer the requirements of the bill, and that this will be entirely republican.

Sir, I am opposed to this minority principle entirely. What we have a right to require as a preliminary is an expression of the people of the rebel States upon the question of their willingness to form a constitution and to be readmitted upon it into the Union; and I insist that that is the greatest security we can take. Suppose there is a majority of them unwilling to come back into the Union, unfriendly to the Union, disposed to throw it off again, and to seize upon the first opportunity to wage war against it, or to avail themselves of any opportunity that may offer to escape from its authority and form an independent government, as they endeavored to do in 1861, will the Senator from Illinois say that such a community, with such a majority, is fit to be readmitted into the Union? Will he say there is no danger in admitting such a political community? Certainly I think he will not; and that is the very point upon which I contest this question. That is the fundamental principle. If a majority of them are willing; if a majority are loyal; if a majority of them will take the oath which is prescribed in this bill—a majority of the whole people—then I shall be prepared to say it is time to think about reconstruction for that particular State; but until that preliminary question is satisfactorily settled by some provision of law, I can assure the ardent Senator from Illinois, who accuses us of being opposed to reconstruction, that I shall vote against all his projects of reconstruction.

I do not wish to expose my country to the trials she has undergone during the last four or five years by this unnecessary and imprudent haste which seems to actuate the Senator from Illinois. Let us act wisely, circumspectly, and seize upon every reasonable security within our reach before we attempt to take this most important step of admitting rebel communities again into Congress. I think, sir, that the statute itself to which I have referred plainly contemplates—I so understood it—that when this business of reconstruction is to be launched in the rebel States it shall only be carried forward in those States where there is a majority of the people, black and white, in favor of reconstruction and readmission.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Michigan tells us he was in favor of the reconstruction bill passed at the last session of Congress. That reconstruction bill, in its very words, says that the constitution shall be submitted to the people and ratified by a majority of those voting upon it—

Mr. HOWARD. I did not say anything to the contrary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the Senator to vote here to-night to require something more than that. I understood him to vote for a proposition offered by the Senator from Vermont, that it should be something more than that. Will he now undertake to fall back upon the bill which he repudiates? Let us see what the bill to which he is committed himself says:

And when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification—

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not inconsistent with this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is inconsistent with this, because you say that a majority of those voting on the ratification of the constitution shall not be sufficient unless they constitute more than half of all the registered voters.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This proposition does not say any thing of the kind.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The proposition that the Senator offered says that very thing, if I understand it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you do not understand it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I do not understand it. I ask the Secretary to be kind enough to send me the bill under consideration, with the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, which was adopted, to the fourth section. [After receiving the bill.] This is the amendment which has the sanction of the Senator from Michigan, and which the Senator from Vermont says makes no such requirements as I have stated:

The constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors, qualified as herein specified, cast at said elections, at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question.

At least one half of all the registered voters must vote upon the question. But what did your reconstruction bill say? It said that if a majority of those voting upon it, whether they were half of the registered voters or not, voted for it, you would accept it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was silent on that point.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It said it would accept it. It was not silent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it is silent on the point as to how many shall vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course; but it is silent also as to requiring a great many other things. When the Congress of the United States said in its law that if a majority of those voting on the question vote in favor of it we would receive it, because it does not say anything more and is silent as to other things have you a right to make other requirements? Any requirement beyond this is inconsistent with this. Why, sir, if you have the right, after having said that if a majority shall vote in favor of the adoption of the constitution of those who do vote, Congress will receive it, so far as that question is concerned; if you have a right to go on and say that it shall not be received unless a majority of all the registered persons vote, you have a right to say it shall not be received unless nine tenths of all the registered persons vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any distinction between that and requiring this oath?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Unquestionably there is a distinction between that and requiring an oath. The oath that we have required is not inconsistent with the provisions in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You prescribe that the voter shall have another qualification beside being a citizen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That he shall take this oath.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This oath is only the evidence of the requirements of the bill. Does the Senator from Vermont mean to say that when we say in an enabling act to a people, "You may form a constitution and adopt it by a majority of those voting on it," we have a right afterward, because we did not say in it "We will not require anything else," to make other requirements?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will allow me, I mean to say that in passing an act such as we did at the last session and this one we now propose to supplement, we have a perfect authority in law, in justice, in morals, and in expediency to make any alteration that it seems fit to us now to make by adding to it, changing it or doing any other thing that expediency or justice, as now developed, require us to do. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can understand that position. The Senator from Vermont means to say that we have a right to disregard the legislation of the last session and change it as expediency shall seem to us to justify. That is perfectly well understood; but that is not the position in which the Senator from Michigan placed himself. He put himself in the position of denouncing as a minority proposition one which requires a majority of those voting on the question only, and not a majority of those registered. That was the provision of his own bill that he supported.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask him whether when he reported this bill he did not understand himself as reporting that on the adoption of the constitution a majority of the registered votes should be required?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the further question: did he understand himself when he was doing that and supporting that idea that he was obstructing reconstruction, which he now accuses everybody else of?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the bill to require a majority of all those registered to vote in favor of the ratification. That was the House bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator so reported.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I reported the House bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And agreed to it, did you not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, then, I should like to ask the other question: whether he understood himself when he favored that and sustained it that he was obstructing reconstruction?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir, I did not understand that I did that with any purpose of obstructing reconstruction. I thought it was a bad provision.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the Senator should not impute that purpose to others who have the same idea now. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That provision of the bill I voted to change. It was thought best in committee not to do it; and I was for carrying out the views of the committee. The Senate, however, did not agree with me in that. I was for making it specific and having it understood. The Senate, however, determined by a decided vote to change that. And now, when an attempt is made by indirection to arrive at the same thing which the Senate has voted down, and I find the Senator from Michigan placing it on the ground that it is a minority proposition and a thing he is utterly opposed to, I think I have a right to call his attention to the act of last session to show that it is in perfect harmony with the bill which he supported. That is what I mean to say.

I look upon this proposition as submitted by the Senator from Vermont as very objectionable, because it seems to me to hold out an encouragement to stay away from the polls. I think the object should be to induce everybody to go to the polls. I would rather have the struggle there. I would rather say to the people of the South, "A majority of those voting upon this question will settle it, and therefore all of you go there and vote."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose there is not more than a baker's dozen of them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There will be an inducement to them when this is to decide the question. Even those opposed to the formation of a constitution and government will go there to vote it down. But when you say that their votes will have more weight by staying away than they will by going you encourage them not to go, and they have more weight just in that proportion which the whole number of those who could vote exceeds the number of those who actually do vote; and we all know that the number who are entitled to vote is always larger than the number who actually do vote. But, sir, I hope we may have a vote on this question. I do not wish to argue it. I only desired to put myself right, and to meet these accusations that somebody is for a minority government.

Mr. MORTON. I am advised that there are other amendments to be offered to this bill—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us vote on this.

Mr. MORTON. I will wait until a vote is taken on the pending amendment. I shall then make a motion to adjourn until Monday morning at ten o'clock. We cannot get through to-night.

Mr. TRUMBULL and others. We can get through to-night as well as any other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Edmunds, Fessenden, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, Morton, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Sprague—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I now move that the Senate adjourn until Monday morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator will now vary his motion and move an adjournment simply.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 14, noes 19.

Mr. HOWARD. If it is in order, I offer at this time the form of oath which I suggested while we were in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope it will be read by the Secretary.

Mr. CONNESS. The whole Senate understand it, and I hope we shall vote upon it without reading it now. We have voted once upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. It is possible that there may be some gentlemen present who did not hear it read before.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out the form of oath prescribed in the first section and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

I do solemnly swear in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of _____, that I have resided in said State for _____ months next preceding this day, and now reside in the county of _____ or the parish of _____ in said State, (as the case may be); that I am twenty-one years old; that I have not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States, nor for felony committed against the laws of any State or of the United States; that I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislatures, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I will faithfully support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, encourage others so to do: so help me God.

Mr. HOWARD. I will inquire of the Clerk whether the words "or affirm" are in the amendment after the word "swear?"

The SECRETARY. They are not.

Mr. HOWARD. They ought to be there, and I wish to have them inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those words will be inserted.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I wish simply to say that I voted against this amendment when it was up before; I came into the Senate Chamber, and without understanding the pending question cast my vote and immediately retired on business. I think I was mistaken; I shall change my vote now, and vote for it.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg simply to say, without spending any time on this subject, that in that form of oath is embodied a succinct and clear statement of all the qualifications necessary for a voter under the act which we passed this month. Instead of referring to a former statute to ascertain the qualifications of voters, they are all inserted in that form of the oath briefly and clearly.

Mr. JOHNSON. And that oath is to be administered to all the black voters, I understand.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish now to offer the amendment that I offered in committee in relation to the vote by ballot, which the Secretary has on his desk.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better adjourn. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. TIPTON. I move an adjournment.

Mr. DRAKE. I think we can have a vote in a very few moments.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to amend the [fourth] fifth section by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That no such constitution shall be considered as entitling the State for which it is framed to such representation unless it provide that at all elections by the people for State, county, or municipal officers the electors shall vote by ballot.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not propose to make any remarks in regard to this amendment. I simply ask a vote upon it, and call for the yeas and nays upon that vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, and Yates—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and on that question I desire to say a word. I appeal to Senators to consider for a moment what is done by that amendment. I voted for it with a view to make the motion to reconsider. We have in all our legislation from the beginning abstained from undertaking to dictate to a State, after it was in the Union, as to the regulation of the suffrage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is this for putting it into their constitution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is for putting it into their constitution as a fundamental article that there shall never be any other way of voting except by ballot.

Mr. DRAKE. No, no.

Mr. TRUMBULL, (to the Secretary.) Let me have the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. It does not say that there shall never be any other way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us see if it does not:

Provided, That no such constitution shall be considered as entitling the State for which it is framed to such representation unless it provide that at all elections by the people for State, county, or municipal officers the electors shall vote by ballot.

They must provide that in the constitution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my friend will allow me, I will state that when I voted for the amendment I supposed it had reference simply to the voting on this constitution and convention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is provided for in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I voted under a misapprehension, and I am very glad the Senator has given me an opportunity to correct it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend a great many Senators voted under a misapprehension; but still the Senate seems disposed to vote for amendments offered by anybody. I notice that some Senators—

Mr. JOHNSON. Let us take a vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; if the Senate understand the effect of it. My object in voting as I did was to call the attention of the Senate to it a second time. This was voted down once when offered in committee; but it is offered here to-night again, and on a yeas and nays vote it receives a majority, departing from our reconstruction bill, putting in a new condition that must be in their constitutions, that none of these States shall be entitled to representation until they provide in their constitutions that the mode of voting shall be by ballot. If the majority think proper to vote that way so be it.

Mr. YATES. I understood this amendment, and I understood it to mean precisely what my colleague says; and I undertake to say we have just as much power and the same right under the Constitution to say that voting shall be by ballot as to say that these States shall provide in their constitutions that negroes shall vote at all.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course.

Mr. YATES. It is precisely the same power. We have long since yielded the point that Congress has the power to prescribe terms to these southern States. My colleague has come to the ground that was maintained a year ago by the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, that Congress had the power to declare who should be voters in these rebel States, and I say in all the States of the Union. We have, at any rate, the same power to provide that the voting shall be by ballot as we have to say that negroes shall vote at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not consider this so much a question of power as a question of expediency and good faith. At the last session of Congress we adopted a bill in which we provided that upon certain terms and conditions these States should be entitled to representation in Congress, and now we propose to add another condition, and we propose to make the mere mode of voting a question upon which shall turn the restoration of this Union. Can we afford to stand upon that ground? Can we defend ourselves upon the ground that a State, because the people may not see proper to adopt a certain mode of voting, shall not be entitled to representation in Congress or to be regarded as a member of this Union? I say that, it seems to me, is putting this great question of reconstruction upon a very small and narrow ground; and if we adopt this proposition, then we may proceed and adopt others, and we may proceed to specify in detail every provision which one of these State constitutions shall contain, and then hold up to them the solemn mockery that they are to frame a constitution when we proceed to prescribe in detail every provision which the constitution shall contain.

Now, sir, we have required, for the sake of protecting the rights of the people that the constitution shall contain certain great fundamental principles; but I deny that it is expedient or just that we should now proceed and require that their constitutions should contain certain forms and modes of transacting their business within their States. It seems to me that is trifling to some extent with those people. One day we adopt a law and the next day we tinker it up. We one day prescribe certain conditions and send forth to those people a proclamation that if they will comply with certain terms and conditions they shall be received back into the Union; and then, when they begin to exhibit a disposition to comply with the terms and conditions that we have proposed, before they can make a fair and reasonable start, we add another condition, and so we pile condition upon condition; and where is this thing to stop? Can these people depend upon anything we say or do in reference to this matter? Do we not furnish them with an argument to say, "If we do comply with these conditions you now propose, tomorrow or next week or next month you will add other terms and conditions, and it is in vain for us to try to seek readmission into the Union, for it is manifest that your object is, by adding terms to terms, to protract and to perpetuate this division in the country?" Now, sir, I say that good faith demands that we should adhere substantially to the provisions of the act we passed at the last session, and that we should not attempt to make this great question of reconstruction, upon which the hopes and the happiness of the millions and the prosperity of this country depend, to turn upon a mere question as to whether the people shall vote in a certain manner in those States.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Oregon proceeds on the theory that this is a little question. He belittles it and then puts it aside. He treats it as a question of form and then scorns it. Sir, it may be a question of form, but it is a form which is vital to the substance; it is vital to that very suffrage which the Senator undertakes to vindicate. Does the Senator know that at this moment the great question which tries British reformers is this question of the ballot? To that our heroic friend in England, John Bright, has dedicated his life. He is seeking to give the people of England vote by ballot. He constantly looks to our country for the authority of a great example; and now the Senator from Oregon seeks to overturn that example. I will not, by my vote, consent to any such thing. I wish to reinforce the liberal cause, not only in my own country, but everywhere throughout the world; and that cause, I assure you, is staked in part on this very question. No, sir; it is not a small question; it cannot be treated as trivial; it is a great question. Call it if you please a question of form, but it is so closely associated with substance that it becomes itself substance. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not recede from the generous and patriotic vote that it has already given. I hope that it will stand firm by one of the truest principles of republican institutions. Ask any student of republican institutions now what is one of the admitted triumphs of those institutions, and he must confess it is vote by ballot. There can be no doubt about it. Do not dishonor that vote; declare that it shall be embodied in the constitutions of all those rebel States. The Senator from Oregon raises no question of power. Congress has the power. That is enough. You must exercise it.

Mr. STEWART. There are a great many things these people ought to put into their constitutions which are matters of substance. I presume they ought to provide in their constitutions for a judiciary system; I presume they ought to provide in their constitutions for a Legislature; I presume they ought to provide various other things in their constitutions. The question is shall we make an entire constitution for them because there are material things which it is proper to put into the constitution. I believe most of these ten States vote by ballot. I know of only one, Virginia, that votes viva voce.

Mr. CONNESS. Kentucky votes viva voce.

Mr. STEWART. Kentucky is not provided for in this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can state how that is. In the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Texas votes are given by ballot. By the constitution of Arkansas all elections were required to take place viva voce; but it was changed to the ballot by an act of November 23, 1846. In Virginia all elections are viva voce.

Mr. STEWART. So that there is no great departure from this ballot system in the ten States. This requirement is, then, not called for by any great violation of the republican principle. Nine of the ten States do it now and will continue to do it undoubtedly, and Virginia very likely will change her constitution and adopt that form, so that there is not even a pretense of necessity for Congress acting a part which will be regarded as bad faith. If we put in this bill before it is acted upon in the South new conditions in addition to the machinery we propose to provide, if we say now in this bill "You shall not come in upon the terms we have offered," we shall subject ourselves to the charge of trifling. We shall lose more than we shall gain by imposing this condition upon Virginia, thereby adding a condition that there is no apparent necessity for, violating our solemn pledge that we made at the last session. By this course we shall put an argument in the mouths of our enemies that our object is to embarrass reconstruction; and if the Union party goes before the country with that charge made upon grounds that can be sustained, I fear the result. If there is to be obstruction, let it come from rebels; but let us act in good faith; let us abide by our pledges; and if failure comes, let it come from broken pledges on the other side; and the same Union party that has stood by us heretofore will ever stand by us. The terms that we have offered to the South are fair and just and liberal; they are indorsed by the country; and it is better to stand where we can stand firmly and surely than to be changing our minds for little things and run the chance of losing all.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I would inquire whether it would be in order to move a substitute for this amendment?

Mr. DRAKE. The question now is on reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not be in order now.

Mr. MORTON. I will then offer it when it is in order; but I simply desire to say that I spoke in favor of this amendment yesterday, and voted for it a few minutes ago. On further reflection, however, I am now inclined to modify my action to some extent. I admit the full importance of the ballot; at the same time I agree with the Senator from Oregon in his proposition that it will not do for us to hamper the work of reconstruction by too many conditions. Let us put in the great fundamental condition, for instance, of universal suffrage, and perhaps we should stop there. I, however, do not agree with him that we cannot make a change in regard to the method of voting so far as the preliminary elections are concerned. They have not accepted our proposition; they have taken no action; the pledge has not been accepted; no rights have vested under it; and we are at perfect liberty up to this time to modify or amend the bill passed by the last Congress, or even to repeal it. There is one thing we can do with propriety: we can provide as instructions to these commanding generals that the preliminary elections, the election of delegates and the election on the ratification of the constitution, shall be by ballot.

Mr. STEWART. That is already provided in the bill, that the voting at those elections shall be by ballot in every State.

Mr. MORTON. I shall then vote against the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree to that; I think we have that power; but this amendment provides that there shall be no representation until the ballot is in the constitution. That I am opposed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Indiana will look at section five of the bill he will see it provides for the ballot in the elections under this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall not reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. With the permission of the Senate, I will modify the amendment slightly, because it has been suggested to me that if it were adopted in its terms it might not include elections for members of Congress. If the Clerk will read the amendment as I propose to modify it, by leaving out the words I have marked in brackets, the naked question will be presented of requiring the ballot at all elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That no such constitution shall be considered as entitling the State for which it is framed to such representation, unless it provide that at all elections by the people the electors shall vote by ballot.

Mr. DRAKE. The words left out are "all elections by the people for State, county, and municipal officers." I wish to leave out those words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is so modified. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is a little troublesome to have the same question recur several times. I spoke on this particular amendment, or one similar to it, on a former occasion, and gave the reasons that occurred to me against its adoption in this particular bill; and it was then I believe rejected by a very decided vote of the Senate. I shall not repeat the argument which I then made. One suggested by me was that a provision of this kind is or may become an obstacle to electoral reform, which in my opinion points either to the abolition or modification of the system of voting by secret ballot. I rise now for the purpose of answering one remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts, to correct the statement made by him that the tendency among English reformers in recent years is in favor of this system of voting by ballot. As I happen to have in my hand a decisive authority upon that point, I will read it. I read from the most recent work on parliamentary reform by Earl Grey. He says:

"How the votes at elections ought to be taken will also require to be carefully considered in framing a new reform bill. One question, of course, will be, whether the system of voting by ballot ought to be adopted, for it is not to be supposed that this old article of the radical faith will be abandoned, or that it will fall even now to command the support of many eager partisans. But there are strong signs that the more than ample discussion the subject has undergone has brought the majority of the public to the conclusion that the opponents of secret voting have had the best of the argument, and the weight of authority inclines to the same side, especially since it has been so decidedly adopted by Mr. Mill in his work on Representative Government. It is needless, therefore, for me to enter in a question which has been completely exhausted, and I will content myself with observing that even if the arguments against the ballot upon principle were less conclusive than I consider them to be, there would be a strong objection to it on the ground of the facilities it affords for abuse and partiality in the conduct of elections."—Earl Grey on Parliamentary Government and Reform, pages 253, 254.

And he proceeds then to state a most powerful argument against the adoption of this principle in the proposed reform of the representation of the people in the British Houses of Parliament. What I rose for, then, at the present moment was to protest against the accuracy of the impression which seems to be entertained by the Senator from Massachusetts with reference to the thought and discussion abroad upon this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Nye, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, and Yates—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER, (at half past ten o'clock.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

On a division, the yeas were 17 and the nays 22; so the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senate has been occupied for two days in the discussion of questions, many of them merely of form. I propose now before this debate closes to call its attention to one of substance, with which, as I submit, the best interests of these rebel States and all the Republic at large are connected. I send to the Chair an amendment, to come in at the end of section four.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the constitution shall require the Legislature to establish and sustain a system of public schools open to all, without distinction of race or color.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I should like to have the yeas and the nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall vote for this bill; not because it is what I desire, but because it is all that Congress is disposed to enact at the present time. I do not like to play the part of Cassandra; but I cannot forbear declaring my conviction that we shall regret hereafter that we have not done more. I am against procrastination; but I am also against precipitation. I am willing even to make haste; but following the ancient injunction, I would make haste slowly. In other words, I would make haste so that our work may be well done and the Republic shall not suffer. Especially would I guard carefully all those who justly look to us for protection, and I would see that the new governments are founded in correct principles. You have the power. Do not forget that duties are in proportion to powers.

I speak frankly. Let me then confess my regret that Congress chooses to employ the military power for purposes of reconstruction. The Army is for protection. This is its true function. When it undertakes to govern or to institute government, it does what belongs to the civil power. Clearly it is according to the genius of republican institutions that the military should be subordinate to the civil. Cedant arma togæ is an approved maxim, which cannot be disregarded with impunity. Even now a fresh debate in the British Parliament testifies to this principle. As late as March, of this year, only a fortnight ago, the Royal Duke of Cambridge, cousin to the Queen and commander of the forces, expressed himself as follows:

"The practice of calling out troops to quell civil disturbances is exceedingly objectionable; but it must not be forgotten that the initiative in such cases is always taken by the civil authorities themselves."

This declaration, which is confined to a particular case, embodies an important rule of conduct, which to my mind is of special application on the present occasion.

By the system which you have adopted, the civil is subordinate to the military, and the civilian yields to the soldier. You accord to the Army an "initiative" which I would assure to the civil power. I regret this. I am unwilling that reconstruction should have a military "initiative." I would not see new States born of the bayonet. Leaving to the Army its proper duties of protection, I would intrust reconstruction to provisional governments, civil in character and organized by Congress. You have already pronounced the existing governments to be illegal. Logically you should proceed to supply their places by other governments, while the military is in the nature of police, until permanent governments, republican in form and loyal in character, are organized. During this transition period permanent governments might be matured on safe foundations and the people educated to a better order of things. As the twig is bent the tree inclines; you may now bend the twig. These States are now like a potter's vessel; you may mold them to be vessels of honor or of dishonor.

From the beginning I have maintained these principles. Again and again I have expressed them in the Senate and elsewhere. At the last session I insisted upon the Louisiana bill in preference to the military bill. In the earliest moments of the present session I introduced a bill of my own, prepared with the best care I could give, in which I embodied what seemed to me a proper and practical system of reconstruction, with provisional governments to superintend the work and pave the way for permanent governments. This bill, which I now hold in my hand, is entitled "A bill to guaranty a republican form of government in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, and to provide for the restoration of these States to practical relations with the Union." Its character may be seen in its title. It is not a military bill or a bill to authorize reconstruction by military power; but it is a bill essentially civil from beginning to end.

The principles on which this bill proceeds may be seen in its preamble, which with the permission of the Senate I will now read:

Whereas in the years 1850 and 1851 the inhabitants of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas changed their respective constitutions so as to make them repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; and whereas the inhabitants of these States made war upon the United States, and after many battles finally surrendered, under the rules and usages of war; and whereas the inhabitants of these States, at the time of their surrender, were without legal State governments, and, as a rebel population, were without authority to form legal State governments, or to exercise any other political functions belonging to loyal citizens, and they must so continue until relieved of such disabilities by the law-making power of the United States; and whereas it belongs to Congress, in the discharge of its duties under the Constitution, to secure to each of these States a republican form of government and to provide for the restoration of each to practical relations with the Union; and whereas until these things are done it is important that provisional governments should be established in these States with legal power to protect good citizens in the enjoyment of their rights and to watch over the formation of State governments, so that the same shall be truly loyal and republican: Therefore.

With this preamble, which exhibits precisely the necessity and reasons of reconstruction, the bill begins by declaring that the provisional governments shall convene on the fourth Monday after its passage, and shall continue until superseded by permanent governments created by the people of these States respectively and recognized by Congress as loyal and republican. It then establishes an executive power in each State, vested in a governor appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not to be removed except by such advice and consent. The legislative power is vested in the governor and in thirteen citizens, called a legislative council, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not to be removed except by such advice and consent. All these being officers of the United States, must take the test-oath prescribed already by act of Congress; and the bill adds a further oath, to maintain a republican form of government, as follows:

I do hereby swear (or affirm) that I will at all times use my best endeavors to maintain a republican form of government in the State of which I am an inhabitant and in the Union of the United States; that I will recognize the indissoluble unity of the Republic, and will discountenance and resist any endeavor to break away or secede from the Union; that I will give my influence and vote to strengthen and sustain the national credit; that I will discountenance and resist every attempt, directly or indirectly, to repudiate or postpone, in any part or in any way, the debt which was contracted by the United States in subduing the late rebellion, or the obligations assumed to the Union soldiers; that I will discountenance and resist every attempt to induce the United States or any State to assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; that I will discountenance and resist all laws making any distinction of race or color; that I will give my support to education and the diffusion of knowledge by public schools open to all, and that in all ways I will strive to maintain a State government completely loyal to the Union, where all men shall enjoy equal protection and equal rights.

I know well the whole history of oaths, and how often they are the occasions of perjury by the wholesale. But I cannot resist the conclusion that at this moment, when we are taking securities for the future, we ought to seize the opportunity of impressing upon the people these fundamental principles on which alone our Government can stand. You may exclude rebels, but their children, who are not excluded, have inherited the rebel spirit. The schools and colleges of the South have been nurseries of rebellion. I would exact from all who seek the public service, or even the elective franchise, a pledge to support a republican government; and to make this pledge perfectly clear, so that all may understand its extent, I would enumerate the points which are essential. If a person cannot give this pledge he ought to take no part in reconstruction. He must stand aside.

From this requirement the bill proceeds to enumerate certain classes who shall be excluded from office, and also from the elective franchise. This is less stringent than what is known as the Louisiana bill. It does not exclude persons who have not held office, unless where they have left their homes within the jurisdiction of the United States and passed within the rebel lines to give aid and comfort to the rebellion; or where they have voluntarily contributed to any loan or securities for the benefit of any of the rebel States or the central government thereof; or where as authors, publishers, editors, or as speakers or preachers, they have encouraged the secession of any State or the waging of war against the United States.

The bill then provides for executive and judicial officers and for their salaries under the provisional governments; also for grand and petit juries; also for a militia. But all officers, jurors, and militiamen, must take the oath that they are not in the excluded classes, and also the oath to support a republican form of government.

The bill then annuls existing Legislatures; also the acts of conventions which framed ordinances of secession and the acts of Legislatures since, subject to certain conditions; and it provides that the judgments and decrees of court, which have not been voluntarily executed and which have been rendered subsequent to the date of the ordinance of secession, shall be subject to appeal to the highest court in the State organized after its restoration to the Union. Safeguards like these seem to be essential to the protection of the citizen.

Besides these provisions, the bill does what it can for education by requiring as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the governor and legislative council in each of these States to establish public schools which shall be open to all without distinction of race or color, to the end that where suffrage is universal, education may be universal also, and the new governments find support in the intelligence of the people.

Such is the outline of the provisional governments. The bill then provides for permanent governments truly loyal and republican. For this purpose the governor must make a registration of male citizens twenty-one years of age, of whatever color, race, or former condition, and on the completion of this register shall invite all to take the oath that they are not in the excluded classes, and also the oath to maintain a republican form of government; and if a majority of the persons duly registered shall take these oaths, then the Governor is to order an election for members of a convention to frame a State constitution. Nobody can vote or sit as a member of the convention except those who have taken the two oaths; but no person can be disqualified on account of race or color. All persons qualified as voters are eligible as members of the convention.

The constitution shall contain in substance certain fundamental conditions, never to be changed without the consent of Congress, as follows:

First. That the Union is perpetual;

Secondly. That slavery is abolished;

Thirdly. That there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other right, on account of race or color, but all persons shall be equal before the law;

Fourthly. That the national debt, including the pensions and bounties to Union soldiers, shall never be repudiated or postponed;

Fifthly. That the rebel debt, whether contracted by a rebel State or by the central government, shall never be recognized or paid, nor shall any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave, or any pension or bounty for service in the rebellion be recognized or paid;

Sixthly. That public schools shall be established which shall be open to all without distinction of race or color; Seventhly. That all the persons excluded from office under this act shall be excluded by the constitution until relieved from their disability by act of Congress.

The constitution must be ratified by the people and submitted to Congress. If Congress shall approve it as republican in form and shall be satisfied that the people of the State are loyal and well-disposed to the Union, the State shall be restored to its former relations and the provisional government shall cease.

Such is the bill which I should be glad to press upon your attention, creating provisional governments and securing permanent governments. It is not a military bill, and on this account, in spirit and form, if not in substance, it might be preferred to that which you have begun to sanction. Besides, it contains abundant safeguards. I regret much that something like this cannot be adopted. It is with difficulty that I renounce a desire long cherished to see reconstruction under the supervision of Congress, according to the forms of civil order, without the intervention of military power. I am sure that such a bill would be agreeable to the Unionists of the rebel States; and this with me is a rule of conduct which I am unwilling to disregard. They are without representation in Congress. Let us be their representatives. I hear their voices gathered into one prayer. I cannot refuse to listen.

But if this bill cannot be adopted, then I ask that you shall take at least one of its provisions. Require free schools as an essential condition of reconstruction. But I am met by the objection that we are already concluded by the military bill adopted a few days ago, so that we cannot establish any new conditions. This is a mistake. There is nothing in the military bill which can have this interpretation. It is only a few days old, so that whatever may be its character, nothing is as yet fixed under its provisions. It contains no compact, no promise, no vested right, nothing which may not be changed if the public interests require. There are some who seem to insist that it is a strait-jacket. On the contrary, this very bill asserts in positive terms "the paramount authority of the United States." Surely this is enough. In the exercise of this authority, it is your duty to provide all possible safeguards. This must be done. To adopt a familiar illustration, these States "must be bound to keep the peace." Nothing is more common after an assault and battery. But this can be done only by good laws, by careful provisions, by wise economies, and securities of all kinds.

Sometimes it is argued that it is not permissible to make certain requirements in the new constitutions, although when the constitutions are presented to Congress for approval we may object to them for the want of these very things. For instance, it is said that we may not require educational provisions in the new constitutions; but that we may object to the constitutions when they are formed, if they do not contain this safeguard. This argument forgets the paramount power of Congress over the rebel States, which you have already exercised in ordaining universal suffrage. Who can doubt that, with equal reason, you may ordain universal education also? And permit me to say that one is the complement of the other. But I do not stop with this assertion as the power. The argument that we are to wait until the constitution is submitted for approval, is not frank. I wish to be plain and explicit. We have the power, assured by reason and precedent. Exercise it. Seize the present moment. Grasp the precious privilege. There are some who act on the principle of doing as little as possible. I would do as much as possible; believing that all we do in the nature of safeguards must redound to the good of all and to the national name. It is in this spirit that I have now moved, to require a system of free schools open to all without distinction of caste. For this proposition I now ask your votes.

You have prescribed universal suffrage. Prescribe now universal education. The power of Congress is the same in one case as in the other. And you are now under an equal necessity to exercise it. Votes by the hundred thousand will exercise the elective franchise for the first time, without delay or preparation. They should be educated promptly. Without education your beneficent legislation may be a failure. The gift you bestow will be vain. I was unwilling to make education the condition of the suffrage; but I ask that it shall accompany and sustain the suffrage.

Mr. President, I plead now for Education. Nothing can be more beautiful or more precious. Education decorates life, while it increases all our powers. It is the charm of society, the solace of solitude, and the multiple of every faculty. It adds incalculably to the resources of the individual and to the resources of the community. Careful inquiry has established what reason declared, that labor is productive in proportion to its education. There is no art which it does not advance. There is no form of enterprise which it does not encourage and charter. It brings victory, and is itself the greatest of all victories.

In a republic Education is indispensable. A republic without education is like the creature of imagination, a human being without a soul, living and moving blindly, with no just sense of the present or the future. It is a monster. Such have been the rebel States. They have been for years nothing less than political monsters. But such they must be no longer.

It is not too much to say that had these States been more enlightened they would never have rebelled. The Barbarism of Slavery would have shrunk into insignificance, without sufficient force to break forth in blood. It appears from the census before the rebellion that in the Slave States there were not less than 493,026 native white persons over twenty years of age who could not read and write, while in the Free States, with double the white population, there were but 248,725 native whites over twenty years of age thus blighted by ignorance. In the Slave States the proportion was 1 to 12; in the Free States it was 1 to 53. The number in Free Massachusetts, with a population of a million, was 1,005, or 1 in 517; the number in Slave South Carolina, with a population under 800,000, was 15,580, or 1 in 7. The number in Free Connecticut was 1 in 277; in Slave Virginia 1 in 5; in Free New Hampshire 1 in 201, and in Slave North Carolina 1 in 3. In this prevailing ignorance we may trace the rebellion. A population that could not read and write naturally failed to comprehend and appreciate a republican government.

This contrast between the rebel States and the loyal States appeared early. It was conspicuous in two Colonies, each of which exercised a peculiar influence. Massachusetts began her existence with a system of free schools. The preamble of her venerable statute deserves immortality. "That learning may not be buried in the grave of our fathers," her founders enacted that every township should maintain a school for reading and writing, and every town of a hundred householders a school to fit youths for the university. This statute was copied in other Colonies. It has spread far, like a benediction. At the same time Virginia set herself openly against free schools. Her Governor, Sir William Berkeley, in 1671, in a reply to the Privy Council of England on the condition of the Colony, testifies as follows: "But I thank God there are no free schools nor printing, and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them. God keep us from both." Thus spoke Massachusetts, and thus spoke Virginia in that ancient day. The conflict of ideas had already begun. Can you hesitate to adopt that statute which is so well justified by time? It began in an infant Colony. Let it be the law of a mighty Republic.

The papers of the day mention an incident, showing how the original spirit of the Virginia Governor still animates these States. A motion to print two hundred copies of the report of the State Superintendent of Public Education was promptly voted down in the Senate of Louisiana, while a Senator, in open speech, "denounced the public education scheme as an unmitigated oppression, an electioneering device, an imposition, which he intended to bring in a bill to abolish if they were allowed to go on legislating." With such brutality is this beautiful cause now encountered. It is as if a savage rudely drove an angel from his tent.

Be taught by this example, and do not hesitate I entreat you. Remember how much is now in issue. You are to fix the securities of the future, and especially to see that a republican government is guaranteed in all the rebel States. I call them "rebel," for such they are in spirit still, and such is their designation in your recent statute. But I ask nothing in vengeance or in unkindness. All that I propose is for their good with which is intertwined the good of all. I would not impose any new penalty or bear hard upon an erring people. Oh no, I simply ask a new safeguard for the future, that these States, through which so much trouble has come, may be a strength and a blessing to our common country, with prosperity and happiness everywhere within their borders. I would not impose any new burden; but I seek a new triumph for civilization. For a military occupation, bristling with bayonets, I would substitute the smile of peace. But this cannot be done without education. As the soldier disappears his place must be supplied by the schoolmaster. The muster-roll must be exchanged for the school register, and our headquarters must be in a school-house.

Do not forget the grandeur of the work in which you are now engaged. You are forming States. Such a work cannot be done hastily or carelessly. The time which you give now will be saved to the country hereafter a thousand fold. The time which you begrudge will rise in judgment against you. It is a law of nature that just in proportion as the being produced is higher in the scale, and more complete in its functions, all the processes are more complex and extended. The mature liberty which we seek cannot have the easy birth of feeble types. As man, endowed with reason and looking to the Heavens, is above the quadruped that walks, above the bird that flies, above the fish that swims, and above the worm that crawls, so should these new governments, republican in form and loyal in soul, created by your care, be above those whose places they take. The Old must give way to the New, and the New must be worthy of a Republic, which, ransomed from Slavery has become an example to mankind. Farewell to the Old! All hail to the New!

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator who has just addressed the Senate tells us that States are about to be born of the bayonet. I protest against that declaration. We have been engaged here for weeks in adopting measures for the reconstruction of the rebel States, and if the vote of the distinguished Senator was not secured, he failed to vote or speak against this proceeding; and now, when the work is about consummated, late on Saturday night, and when we are about to take the final vote and to adjourn, he with all the power of his influence gives it out to the world that we are establishing States that are to be born of the bayonet. No, sir; no. The constituents of these States are as free to form constitutions or not to form them as any community that ever existed, and I for one will not submit to be charged with being a party to the formation of States by the bayonet. What has the bayonet to do with it? The military commander, it is true, provides the formality which is adopted under our direction for holding an election; but we have provided over and over again that nothing can be done except by the free ballot of a majority. Is there any bayonet pricking voters up to the polls to adopt our sentiments? Do we force universal suffrage upon the South by the bayonet? That charge we have had from the other side of the House; but I will not submit, without my protest, to receive it from this side of the House.

The proposition is that we shall provide free schools without distinction of race. The reconstruction law already provides that there shall be no discrimination in legislation on account of race or color. The fourteenth amendment has that provision, and that amendment must be a part of the constitution before any one of these States can be introduced. There is, therefore, no necessity for that part of the Senator's amendment. Then, sir, shall we, as a Federal Government, undertake to provide free school systems for the States? Have we any right to do it? None whatever. We have no right to do it in Massachusetts or in New Jersey, and we shall have no right to do it in Alabama or in Georgia when they become States. And, sir, for us to undertake now to add new conditions to the reconstruction measure which the Thirty-Ninth Congress adopted I hold to be bad faith. When we have said to these States, "If you comply with our terms as stated in the reconstruction act you shall be restored to representation," and when they are now taking measures to accept our proposition, are we to say to them "Oh, just a little more; you must give a homestead to every colored man in the South; you must give education to every freedman, or else the bargain is undone?" That is not the way to do business. As I understand the very description of an upright man to be, and it is so of an upright nation, that he swears to his hurt, and changes not. It has been said that when savages make a treaty, if they give a whiff of tobacco smoke over it that little formality not only makes it binding, but makes it sacred. And that you may buy a truce of pirates, and after they have made the bargain they will live to it; and if you should have the very inmates of our penitentiaries turned together as a community, whatever depredations they might commit upon each other, if they formed a society good faith would be their religion, and would be adhered to. Let this nation keep its faith. I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. STEWART. As I expect to vote for this bill, it is rather unpleasant on every occasion to hear it branded as a very bad measure. If any gentleman considers this a bad bill I think it is his duty to vote against it. If he thinks it is an enormity, if he thinks it is a violation of republican principles, let him vote against it. When I believe a bill is bad I state to the Senate that that is my judgment, and I vote against it. But it seems to me that a Senator who means to vote for a bill ought not to speak of it in that way, and seek to get the credit before the country of having advocated some things higher and better than we are willing to adopt. After we have labored for days and weeks to get the best bill we can, and have finally agreed upon a measure, it seems to me that there is an implied understanding that those who vote for the bill indorse it. It appears, however, to have become somewhat the habit in the Senate to put yourself on the record for a bill, and yet denounce the bill before the country. I say again that if I thought this was a bad bill I would vote against it, but if I vote for a bill I will defend it before the country. After we have been laboring in these Halls for weeks and months to prepare a bill which is the result of the combined wisdom of all, it is hardly fair for one Senator to pronounce it a bad bill; to say that it provides for organizing governments by military power; that these are not to be republican governments; and to lecture the Senate for being about to perpetrate a great outrage upon republican principles. If the Senator from Massachusetts votes against the bill, he takes no responsibility in the matter; but now it will be said, "Out of your own mouths we will condemn you: here is one of your party who voted for the bill and he denounces it as an outrage upon republican principles."

Mr. SUMNER. I used no such language.

Mr. STEWART. Did not the Senator from Massachusetts say that this was organizing by the military, and that it was not republican for the military to organize civil governments?

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. Did not the Senator denounce it as born of the bayonet; and shall we not hear that remark continually repeated throughout the canvass next fall? If the Senator is with us for this bill, is it fair to send us before the country branded as voting for a bill to create governments born of the bayonet? If the Senator is against the bill, let him denounce it; but do not let us make the admission for the Republican party that these governments are to be born of the bayonet, and that we are attempting to organize States in that way. I do not want that admission to bind me, for I intend to deny it. We give these people at each step of this process an opportunity to vote fairly and freely, and I believe the South will accept it in good faith and the voice of the people will be heard. I expect to defend the measure hereafter, and I expect to deny the charge, when it comes from the Copperheads, if it does next fall, that these organizations are born of the bayonet.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, I do not rise to debate, but simply to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts. I heartily approve of the proposition which he has laid down of universal education, especially in these southern States, and would be glad to have such a requisition laid on all the States of the Union if it were not unconstitutional; but I wish to ask him this question: does he think it possible to establish a system of common schools in these southern States corresponding to the common-school system of New England unless he first confiscates the large estates and divides them into small homesteads, so that there may be small landholders who shall support these schools by the taxation which is laid upon them?

Mr. SUMNER. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. You think it is possible?

Mr. SUMNER. I do certainly; most clearly.

Mr. MORTON. I intend to vote for this proposition. I regard it as a fundamental condition. I regard the education of these people as essential to reconstruction. When you add to the uneducated whites the uneducated negroes you have a full half of the whole voting population unable to read and write; and we cannot expect the men who own the property voluntarily to tax themselves to provide education for the others. When you get outside of the towns of the South you find the colored people living upon the large plantations; the rebel whites own their homes, their shanties, and not one in fifty of those colored people owns ten dollars. They are unable to maintain themselves without employment, and their education must be provided for by the State or they will remain uneducated; and until they are educated the political power will remain almost entirely in the hands of the present rebel-educated classes.

We are all interested in this matter. Republican government may go on for awhile with half the voters unable to read or write, but it cannot long continue. Intelligence is the very foundation of republican government. We have all said it a thousand times and we all believe it; and now, sir, at this last, this most important hour in this great work of reconstruction, let us provide for the education of these people.

I would have been in favor of having the colored people of the South wait a few years until they were prepared for suffrage, until they were to some extent educated; but the necessities of the times forbade that; the condition of things required that they should be brought to the polls at once; and we have done that; but now let us provide against the danger by making provision for this steady education of these people. I say the proposition is fundamental in its character; its importance cannot be overestimated, and I hope that it will be placed as a condition upon complying with which they shall be permitted to return. If we say so now they will comply with it, and it will not delay the work of reconstruction one hour; but we cannot say so when their constitutions come here unless we lay down the condition now.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall simply content myself with voting against this amendment proposed without giving the reason why at this hour; but since the bill before the Senate for which I intend to vote has been arraigned here as a provision for producing States to be born of the bayonet, and as I in part represent a State which was literally born of a military order, not of the bayonet (though perhaps as much born of the bayonet as any of the States which will be organized under this act and the act to which it is supplementary will be so born) the accusation or denunciation comes home to me. The civil government of the State of California was the product of a military order; and it is not now less free, it is not less generous, it is not less courageous, it is not less patriotic for that reason. I will not at this time say anything upon the good taste of the denunciation of this measure that has taken place. Under other circumstances I would not allow it to pass without, not my simple protest, but without some attempt to analyze what has been said in that connection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not desire that my vote against this amendment shall be understood as expressing an opinion on my part that a general system of education is not important to the public. My convictions are very well established upon that particular subject; but I vote against this amendment and all such amendments to this bill upon the ground that I think the Congress of the United States has no power under the Constitution to make a constitution for a State, any article or any section of any article of a State constitution. What shall be in a State constitution depends altogether on the will and pleasure of the people of that State. Whether Congress may afterward hold that constitution to be republican in form is altogether another question; and the power of Congress to judge of that particular question confers no power upon Congress to prescribe in advance a form of government to a State.

Upon that ground I vote against the amendment. I would vote against it also on another ground. I was a member of the committee that reported this bill to the body. I suggested such amendments as I thought were right in the committee; and I thought it my duty to stand by the majority of the committee. I believe all of the committee except myself were in favor of the bill; I am not, and was not in the committee; but I suggested in the committee such amendments as I thought ought to be made, and I can see no propriety on the part of Congress, no fair dealing, no honesty to propose a proposition to the States at the last session and then in this bill, which is supplementary thereto, and which proposes simply to carry that into practical operation, to add conditions not suggested to the people at the last session. I cannot think it is right. I would not think it right for a man in any business transaction to treat me so; and therefore I stand by the committee, and have done it in the Senate, upon that general proposition. I have felt myself committed to it; and should feel so now were I a friend of the bill. Being an enemy to the bill—no, I will not say that—but, not being in favor of the bill, I do not feel authorized to do otherwise upon this particular question than I would do if I were a friend to it. I think we have no power to say to any State, North or South, one thing or another shall go into its constitution. If we can make one article or one section of an article, we can write the constitution out here in the Senate Chamber and say to a State, "Adopt this or you never come into this Union again."

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the question of power, I take it, must be settled in this Chamber. You have already most solemnly voted in favor of requiring in every constitution of the rebel States suffrage for all, without distinction of color or race or previous condition. Now, the greater contains the less. If you can do that you can do everything. If you can require that magna charta of human rights you can require what is smaller. Now it is already fixed in your statutes, enrolled in your archives, that Congress has this great power over the rebel States. I do not say whether it has this great power over other States; that is not now the question; but it has the power over the rebel States. That power is derived from several sources; first from the necessity of the case, because the State governments there are illegal, and that whole region has passed, as in the case of Territories, under the jurisdiction of Congress. There is no legal government there except that which Congress supplies. Then again you have another source in the military power which is at this moment established over that region. Then again, still further, you have in that great clause of the Constitution of the United States by which you are authorized to guaranty to every State a republican form of government. There is enough. Out of these three sources, these three overflowing fountains, you have ample authority in this case. You have exercised it now by prescribing in their constitutions suffrage for all: I ask you to go one step further, and to prescribe education for all.

But I am met here by personal objections; I am asked why I have not brought this forward before. Sir, I have brought it forward in season and out of season. I have on the table before me a speech of mine made in 1865, in which, in laying down the great guarantees that we were to seek, I declared them as follows: "First, the unity of the Republic; second, enfranchisement; thirdly, the guarantee of the national debt; fourthly, the repudiation of the rebel debt; fifthly, equal suffrage; and sixthly, education of the people." Therefore from the beginning I have asked this guarantee, believing as I do most clearly that under the Constitution now you may demand it. If you may demand it, if you have the power, then do I insist it is your duty to do it. Duties are in proportion to powers. You have not these great powers intrusted to you merely for display or idleness, but they are for employment to the end that the Republic may be advanced and fortified.

Then I have been reminded very earnestly by two Senators that I have used strong language in saying that these governments will be open to the imputation of being born of the bayonet. This is not the first time that I have used that language in this Chamber with reference to this very policy. From the beginning I have protested against any policy of reconstruction proceeding from the military power. I have asserted again and again that it was contrary to the genius of republican institutions and to a just economy of our political forces. I have not been hearkened to. Others have pressed the idea of military power; and now as I submit, as I am about to record my vote in favor of the proposition, I cannot but express my sincere and unfeigned regret that Congress did not see its way to a generous measure of reconstruction which should be purely civil in its character, having in it no element of military power. Such a proposition you had before you at the last session in the Louisiana bill, which I sought to press day by day upon your attention; and when at the last moment the military bill was passed, I, from my place here, declared that I should deem it my duty at the earliest possible moment in this session to press the Louisiana bill or some kindred measure founded on a different principle.

I was early tutored in the principles of Jefferson; I cannot forget his message where he lays down among the cardinal principles or what he calls "the essential principles of our Government," and consequently those which ought to shape its administration. I quote his own words: "The supremacy of the civil over the military authority." This he records as one of the "essential principles of our Government." Imbued with that principle I had hoped that Congress would see the way to establish at once civil governments in all those States, and not subject them to military power except so far as might be needed for the purposes of protection. That is the true object of the Army. It is to protect us; it is not in any way to make constitutions or to superintend the making of constitutions. At least so I have read the history of republican institutions, and such are the aspirations that I presume to express for my country.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the argument suggested by the Senator has no force if at all addressed to myself, with which he started out. He suggested that if Congress had the power to prescribe as a condition for the return of these States that they should allow universal suffrage, then Congress could go so far as to impose his amendment. I have no doubt of that; but I did not vote for that proposition, and the objection I make to this was equally strong to that; but I want to ask the Senator when he was considering a bill which was regarded as a finality, why did he not propose this as a condition then? If there is a matter of dispute between him and myself, and that has to be settled between us as honorable gentlemen, and he makes his proposition for settlement for me to accept or reject, is it not his duty to state his proposition in full, and when I come to accept it, is it right, is it fair, is it honest for him to say, "I will not do it now unless you go still further?" If he finds that my necessities have pressed me up to the proposition which he has made, then shall he in honor take advantage of that and press me still further? I believe the majority is bound by the proposition of the last session.

The source of authority for this sort of thing is not found, I think, where the Senator seeks it. When he says it is found in necessity, that is a source of authority and power for anything; it depends upon the notions of each man; it is like the Chancellor's foot as a measure of justice or the Chancellor's conscience, independent of law and precedent, for the settlement of disputed cases. It is no rule.

The war power, the military power, is also referred to. What has that to do with the present case? There is no war, and he knows it. He knows there is no occasion because of a state of war for the establishment of military authority in any State of this Union. From Maine to the Rio Grande there is peace, a peace more profound, perhaps, than has ever been known in the country, anonymous letters to the contrary notwithstanding; a community that cannot make resistance; a community that is crushed; a community that is crying for a supply of bread; a community in which it is said sixty thousand are likely to die of starvation. In such a case, it is not generous to press a fallen foe. No power can be found in the military authority of the Government for Congress to make a constitution for a State.

I do not intend to protract this discussion; I have not done it in the progress of this bill; I believe the Senator from Massachusetts has not; he has reserved his great proposition, one that was to startle the country, for the last hours of the debate. It was to be the ornament, the dome upon the capitol of this restoration policy, and his rhetoric was to be the last flourish in the controversy. Now, if he is through, I suppose we can get to a vote, and that will give much more pleasure than anything I can say. I should like now upon this bill simply to say "no."

Mr. SUMNER. I have not risen to protract the debate, but to call attention for one minute to this question of power. I propose that we shall require in these constitutions a provision for free schools. Have we not the power to do it? The very reconstruction act to which this bill is supplementary, has the following language: "And when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same," and after a great many other things besides that are done, their representatives may be admitted into Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information, and it may save the necessity of saying anything. Does he mean by this proposition that each of these States shall appropriate money enough out of its treasury to support a system of common schools throughout the entire State?

Mr. SUMNER. I mean that each State shall provide in its own way for a system of common schools within its own borders.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon; but his amendment says that the State shall "establish and sustain" a system of public schools. Does that impose upon each State the necessity of appropriating from its public treasury the necessary amount of money to sustain schools?

Mr. SUMNER. From the State treasury? Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then another question. Does this proposition mean that each school shall be equally open to persons without distinction of race or color, that there shall not be such a thing as a school for white children and a school for black children, but that each and every school shall be open to children of both races?

Mr. SUMNER. If I should have my way, according to the true principle, it would be that the schools, precisely like the ballot-box or the rail cars, should be open to all. But the proposition is necessarily general in its character; it does not go into details; but I submit that it is important that we should declare this in advance, so that when their constitutions come here and are submitted for our approval they may not complain if we object to them because they do not provide free schools. My proposition is in the nature of notice to all these States that if they expect their constitutions to be approved they must insert in those constitutions a provision for free schools.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, it is quite too late in the evening for me to indulge in anything like protracted remarks, and I will only add a word to what has already been said in favor of this proposition.
